1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 discusses the relationship of this pericope to Paul's message, though with less emphasis on the unity of the perspectives. See also F. F. Bruce 1952: 66–69 and the exegesis of 18:14a.

4 So the aorist passive participle σταθείς (as he stood); BAGD 382 §II.1b; BAA 775 §II.1b. The circumstantial aorist passive participle of ἵστημι is found in the NT only in Luke's writings: Luke 18:40; 19:8; Acts 2:14; 5:20; 11:13; 17:22; 25:18; 27:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1186. In the Jewish world, it was not unusual to stand and pray (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:14, 22; Plummer 1896: 416; SB 1:401–2; 2:240; Marshall 1978: 679).

13 Jeremias 1963a: 141 overstates the parallelism with Pauline usage, as do Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 and Arndt 1956: 380. Linnemann 1966: 62–63, 144–46 n. 11; Ernst 1977: 497–98; and Marshall 1978: 680–81 are clearer. Cf. Ps. 51:19 [51:21 MT]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 12:7; 1Q28b [= 1QSb] 4.22.

1 The Gospel of Thomas 22 expands on the theme here by including the Gnostic doctrine of the "primordial unit" (Fitzmyer 1985: 1192).

3 There is no need to regard the story as a creation based on 2 Kings 4:27, but so Bultmann 1963: 32, who also cites a rabbinic story from the later b. Ketub. 63a, where disciples try to dissuade Akiva from seeing his mother. This approach is rightly rejected by Fitzmyer 1985: 1192 and Marshall 1978: 681–82.

4 On the impersonal use of the third-person plural, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 and Zerwick 1963: §1. The imperfect in this context vividly portrays ongoing action by many: "They were bringing."

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

11 Luke 17:20–37 (esp. 17:20–21) has both senses. Note the ambiguity in 18:24–25. Luke 23:42 looks at immediate entry, though it is in the context of death as opposed to entering the kingdom in life. Acts 14:22 speaks of future entry. Another immediate instance is John 3:5. Fitzmyer notes that though the expression in 18:17 is rare, it fits with the invitation of 17:21.

3 Bultmann 1963: 33–34 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1219 take 19:8 as a Lucan addition, breaking the flow of the story. Marshall 1978: 695 agrees with Bultmann that 19:10 may be a later comment, but Fitzmyer sees it as part of the account. Schweizer 1984: 290 regards 19:8 as a non-Lucan addition to the story, while Luke is responsible for 19:10. Those who see Luke adding 19:10 often suggest that it is his version of the famous ransom saying of Mark 10:45.

4 Διέρχομαι is common in Luke's writings: Luke 2:15, 35; 4:30; 5:15; 8:22; 9:6; 11:24; 17:11; 19:4; Acts 12:10; 13:6; 14:24; plus eighteen more times in Acts; BAGD 194; BAA 391; Fitzmyer 1985: 1223–24; Plummer 1896: 432.

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1224 sees this as the wrong question to ask, since the text does not address the issue. Klostermann 1929: 185 simply says that supernatural knowledge is not expressed by Luke. Luce 1933: 292 takes a rationalistic approach: Jesus inquired about his name, but Luke portrays his knowledge as supernatural. Nolland 1993b: 905 speaks of Jesus' "uncanny knowledge."

2 Fitzmyer wrongly says that Manson 1949: 313 agrees with this position. Manson does hold that Luke's traditional source is responsible for the addition.

10 BAGD 524 puts the value of one mina at eighteen to twenty dollars, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1235 estimates twenty-five dollars. Since the value of ancient currency constantly changes in relation to modern monetary units, it is clearer to compute the value according to daily wages. The figure of four months is calculated on the basis of a six-day workweek (the NIV's marginal note that "a mina was about three months' wages" probably includes the Sabbath in its calculation).

15 On the difference between burying and wrapping, see Jeremias 1963a: 61 n. 51. Fitzmyer 1985: 1236 is skeptical of what value this difference has for the meaning of this parable, but gives no reason for his doubt (perhaps the late date of the talmudic material?). Either way, the detail reflects a failure to respond to the king.

16 Αὐστηρός (severe, strict, exacting) is used in the NT only in this pericope (twice); also 2 Macc. 14:30. In P. Tebt. vol. 2 #315 line 19, the term is used of a demanding financial inspector; MM 93; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

17 This view of the king's sternness is conceptually like Josephus's description of a law that punishes slaves more harshly; Against Apion 2.30 §216; C. Taylor 1901; Plato, Laws 913c (11); Brightman 1927–28; Philo, Hypothetica 7.6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

23 Not accepting that the parable deals with final judgment, Fitzmyer 1985: 1238 and Grundmann 1963: 365 argue that it refers instead to Jerusalem's destruction. This contradicts 19:11, which states that the parable deals explicitly with the consummated kingdom's coming and judgment at that time. Nonetheless, the observation is helpful, because Jerusalem's judgment (19:41–44; 21:5–38) pictures a greater judgment to come. Though not in this parable, that judgment pictures for Luke what the final judgment is like.

8 Matthew emphasizes the fulfillment of Zech. 9:9. Cf. the similar phrase in Luke 23:53 about the tomb "in which no one had yet been laid." Fitzmyer 1985: 1248–49 denies any allusion to the "messianically associated" Gen. 49:11 (see also the exegesis of Luke 19:31).

10 Luke uses ἄγω (to bring) thirteen times (Luke 4:1, 9, 29, 40; 10:34; 18:40; 19:27, 30, 35; 22:54; 23:1, 32; 24:21), while Mark uses it only three times (Mark 1:38; 13:11; 14:42) and Matthew four times (Matt. 10:18; 21:2, 7; 26:46). Mark uses φέρω (to bring along) fifteen times compared to Matthew's and Luke's four times each. This difference is one of Marcan style. Fitzmyer 1985: 1249 argues that Matthew and Luke chose the more precise verb. Luke's reading leaves a chiasmus in the verse: "finding the bound donkey … loosing it and bring it" (Nolland 1993b: 924).

26 As in Gen. 50:24–25; Exod. 3:7, 16; Job 10:12; 29:4; Wis. 2:20; 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:12; and 1 Clem. 50.3; correctly Marshall 1978: 719. Fitzmyer 1985: 1259 does not specify which view he holds.

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1275 says that the question has no implied messianic claim for Jesus, but only an affirmation that he is from God. But given John's teaching on the Coming One, an indirect allusion is implied. There is much at stake in answering the question.

4 Luce 1933: 308 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1279 present the case for nonauthenticity without endorsing it. Snodgrass 1983: 106–10 has a detailed defense of the authenticity of this parable. He concludes: "If one rejects the dominical origin of this parable, he or she does so because of presuppositions about the nature of the Gospels . . . and not because of any element in the parable itself."

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been "abandoned" by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

8 All other uses of μὴ γένοιτο are made by Paul, who uses it fourteen times, ten times in Romans alone (e.g., 3:4, 6, 31; 6:2, 15; BDF §384; BDR §384.2). Fitzmyer 1985: 1285 notes that the Hebrew equivalent translates, “It is an abomination to me/us” (Gen. 44:17; Josh. 22:29).

5 On Tiberius’s rule, see the exegesis of 3:1. The origin of Caesar as the title for the reigning emperor goes back to Julius Caesar; Fitzmyer 1985: 1296.

10 The phrase τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ (the things of God) occurs elsewhere in Mark 8:33; 1 Cor. 2:11, 14; 7:32–34; Fitzmyer 1985: 1296–97.

12 Many follow Ranke 1901: 1.1–9 in seeing this saying as Jesus’ most significant political statement. Fitzmyer 1985: 1292 objects to the two-kingdoms view (which appeals to Prov. 8:15–16; Dan. 2:21, 37–38; Wis. 6:1–11 for support), arguing that it makes Caesar and God equals.

13 That the saying about rendering to God is not ironic stands against viewing the first saying as ironic (Fitzmyer 1985: 1292). The use of the conjunction καί (and) instead of ἀλλά (but) shows that the whole saying is to be taken together.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1299 notes seven differences between Mark and Luke, mostly stylistic; see the exegesis for details. In addition, he notes how Luke 20:38b–39 is a Lucan summary, while 20:40 is like Mark 12:34 (which is in a section that Luke lacks). Luke 20:34–36 has Jesus teach the Sadducees directly and lacks any rebuke about how they read Scripture. Fitzmyer also notes a possible conceptual parallel to 4 Macc. 7:19.

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1324, 1326, 1329 speaks of Mark plus L and argues that L did not contain the whole speech. To achieve this position, he notes parallels to Q material in the Luke 17 discourse and the few portions of Luke 21 that do not parallel Mark 13.

9 For form-critical discussions of the individual subunits, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1329, 1334, 1338, 1342, 1348, 1351, 1355, 1357; Bultmann 1963: 36, 122–23, 125, 119; Berger 1984: 81, 296–97, 304–5, 48, 142, 352.

10 Solomon's Temple was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon in 586 b.c. and reconstructed by Zerubbabel in about 516 b.c. (Hag. 1:4–15). Those who had seen the original temple felt that Zerubbabel's was not as great (Fitzmyer 1985: 1330).

14 Noting that the fall was fated by God, Josephus, Jewish War 6.4.5 §250, describes the destruction of Jerusalem on the tenth day of Loüs (= 29 August a.d. 70). The temple was first burned (Jewish War 6.4.5 §250) and then razed (Jewish War 7.1.1 §§1–4). Josephus also describes portents of the end; Jewish War 6.5.3–4 §§288–315. The OT describes the first destruction of Jerusalem: Jer. 52:12–13; 7:1–14; 22:5; 27:6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1331.

18 Fitzmyer follows Conzelmann 1960: 126; but correctly Marshall 1978: 762. Danker 1988: 329 notes that the issues of Jerusalem's destruction and the end-time were linked in most people's minds; one suggests the other. Jesus' answer goes beyond the temple. Zmijewski 1972: 93–95 suggests that the reference to the "coming days" in 21:6 suggests an eschatological setting, since ἡμέρα (day) alludes to the day of the Lord. It must be remembered that any judgment that consumed Jerusalem would be seen as catastrophic, so either event—Jerusalem's fall or the temple's removal—would suggest severe judgment. The disciples are asking, "When will that judgment come?"

21 Fitzmyer 1985: 1337 is against a source. Creed 1930: 255 and Leaney 1958: 260 say Luke inserted the phrase because he was detailing what was sketched in previous verses. Marshall 1978: 764–65 speaks of the great puzzlement that this addition has caused and mentions the possible influence of another source (also Schramm 1971: 174–75). Perhaps this one source had the two eschatological discourses that Luke reflects. But what caused the difference? Did Luke or his source supply a clarifying stylistic break? Either option is possible.

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

1 The term passion is a wordplay on Hebrew פֶּסַח (Pesaḥ., Passover) and Greek πάσχω (paschō, to suffer); Fitzmyer 1985: 1369; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.10.1.

1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1368, 1373 strongly objects to Bultmann's questioning (1963: 262) of this material.

7 The name Iscariot occurs here in its Grecized form (Ἰσκαριώτην), not its Semitic form (Ἰσκαριώθ), as in 6:16 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1374). Matthew here uses the Greek form, Mark the Semitic. On the Semitic form of the name, see the exegesis of 6:16.

1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1383 overstates the passage by arguing that Matthew and Luke are different. Marshall 1978: 791–92 suggests that the Lucan details point to arrangement.

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

4 Ὥρα (hour) occurs many times in the passion narrative, including Mark 14:35, 41; John 12:23; 13:1; 17:1; Luke 22:53. Because ὥρα carries no qualifiers (as in 22:53), it conveys no special sense of God's hour (against Grundmann 1963: 392 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1384; as noted by Marshall 1978: 794 and especially Soards 1987: 33).

8 Note γάρ (for) and the solemn and emphatic λέγω ὑμῖν (I say to you; also 22:18; 13:35; 9:27). Ἕως ὅτου (until; also 12:50; 13:8) is equivalent to ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (from now on) in 22:18 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1396).

19 On interpreting the action, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1401–2. Plummer 1896: 498 argues that the instruction to observe the supper came from the risen Lord later, but there is no record of such a later instruction.

20 On the various views, see the summary in Marshall 1978: 805–6, who argues that in general Luke's form is the most primitive, but notes the difficulty of the decision. Fitzmyer 1985: 1402 prefers Mark's originality, as does Nolland 1993b: 1047, who mostly follows Ruckstuhl 1980.

3 Marshall 1978: 808 assumes at least two sources. Fitzmyer 1985: 1408–9 mentions the transposition, but acknowledges the possibility of another source.

7 Fitzmyer 1985: 1407 sees “independent traditions” about such a discourse at the supper, though he also notes the conceptual parallelism with John. Plummer 1896: 500 speaks of the confusion about its location within the tradition, though he argues that such contention at the meal may have occurred when the disciples chose seats at the meal. But, he argues, such contention after the footwashing is unlikely. Of course, it may be that Jesus was addressing a contention from a previous occasion. Perhaps the tradition had it in this latter location as part of the summary of what was actually said at the meal, even though Jesus said it during the meal.

11 Note contrastive δέ (but). Fitzmyer 1985: 1418 points out that Peter and John served by preparing the meal.

12 This verse is unique to Luke and reflects an independent source, which Fitzmyer 1985: 1412 calls L. Conceptual parallels are found in Mark 10:45 and Matt. 23:8–10; Marshall 1978: 813–14; Danker 1988: 349–50.

14 This Father-Son motif occurs elsewhere in Luke 12:32; John 15:9; 17:18, 21–22; 20:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1419. Jesus exercises executive authority here.

18 But so Fitzmyer 1985: 1419, who speaks of “reconstituted Israel,” and Marshall 1978: 817, who suggests an allusion to the Lord’s Supper, along with many others (those who see a tie to Israel include Ellis 1974: 256 and Danker 1988: 350–51). Dupont 1964: 388 correctly argues against this view. This expectation is continued in the question of Acts 1:6–8 and the remarks of Peter in Acts 3:18–21. Even later Petrine expectation of a new heaven and earth in 2 Pet. 3:10–14, which looks to the ultimate end of history, does not remove this intervening stage when God deals with Israel in bringing it again into the blessing reserved for God's people.

19 Luke uses δέομαι fifteen times, Matthew once (Matt. 9:38), and Mark and John not at all; Fitzmyer 1985: 1425; Marshall 1978: 821.

21 Against Bultmann 1963: 267 n. 2, who argues that the original tradition did not know of Peter's denial; but so correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1425 and esp. Marshall 1978: 821.

25 Plummer 1896: 505 and Luce 1933: 335 make this connection, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1426 says that there is no need to do so. Nolland 1993b: 1073 suggests 2:30 a.m. for the initial crowing and notes that the reference in m. B. Qam. 7.7 forbidding chickens in Jerusalem is probably a later idealization and thus not a historical challenge to this detail.

31 Schwarz 1979: 22 suggests a misreading of the Aramaic term for "end," but Fitzmyer 1985: 1433–34 rejects this view.

33 Plummer 1896: 507 and Marshall 1978: 827 see the idiom here (based on Gen. 45:28; Exod. 9:28; Deut. 3:26; 1 Kings 19:4; 1 Chron. 21:15; 1 Macc. 2:33). Doubt about its presence is expressed by Fitzmyer 1985: 1434 and Rengstorf, TDNT 3:295–96.

1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1436, 1440 speaks of the "inner" Jesus, but is careful to warn that this passage should not be overly psychologized.

2 Most who take this latter approach speak of dependence on Mark, while Matthean prioritists favor dependence on Matthew. Fitzmyer 1985: 1437–39 vigorously defends Lucan reworking of Mark, citing numerous touches of Lucan vocabulary. See the exegesis for details. For defense of an additional source, see Nolland 1993b: 1081–82. Connections with John 16:6, 20–22; 18:2, 11 suggest traditional background.

12 Fitzmyer 1985: 1444–45 rightly stresses the comparative force of ὡσεί (like), elsewhere used by Luke at Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 23:44; 24:11; Acts 1:15; 2:3, 41; 6:15; 10:3; 19:7, 34 (variant reading). On the medical possibilities, see R. Brown 1994: 185; Holzmeister 1938; Keen 1892; and Keen 1897.

5 The style (ἰδόντες [seeing] at the start of a sentence) is frequent in Luke: 8:34, 47; 23:47; Marshall 1978: 836. The direct question with εἰ (if) is often used by Luke: e.g., Luke 13:23; Acts 1:6; 7:1; 19:2; 21:37; 22:25 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1448). But as Luke 22:67 shows, such a question can reflect parallels in the tradition. Luke is summarizing here.

7 For the use of κατά meaning “after” in a distributive sense, see Luke 11:3; Fitzmyer 1985: 1451. Luke’s audience of chief priests fits these remarks. While it is not necessary to see the priests themselves carrying weapons, they are responsible for the tone of the arrest by whom they bring (against the implications of R. Brown 1994: 282, who thinks the detail raises a historical problem).

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

4 J. Green 1988: 282 calls Luke the most primitive form of the tradition. Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–59 is agnostic on historicity, saying that it is impossible to prove. The most detailed English study, Catchpole 1971: 153–220, gives the nod to Luke. For a more skeptical appraisal, giving seven reasons not to accept these accounts as authentic, see E. Sanders 1985: 296–99. For a detailed response to most of his objections, see Bock 1994b. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 392–93) rejects Jesus' prediction (22:61) and the trial dialogue (22:67–69, 70) as inauthentic because 22:61 recalls 22:34 and the absence of disciples at the trial means that no witnesses were present. Jesus' anticipation of Peter's failure, however, reflects his knowledge of how pressure would cause Peter to wilt (the disciples' past record of inconsistency might also contribute to Jesus' expectation). The presence of people like Joseph of Arimathea at the trial makes an internal witness possible.

6 Καί (also) probably alludes to John's being with Peter, as John 18:15 appears to suggest. Οὗτος (this one) is probably derogatory; Fitzmyer 1985: 1464. In Acts 4:13, Peter is again associated with Jesus, but his response is quite different!

16 Besides those already cited, other major works on Jesus' trial are Bammel 1970, Blinzler 1969, Sherwin-White 1963: 24–47, and Winter 1974. Catchpole, Blinzler, and Sherwin-White defend the historicity of much of the Lucan account. Fitzmyer 1985: 1466 also thinks a morning trial is most likely.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

30 Marshall 1965–66: 347 and A. Moore 1966: 184–87 answer other objections to authenticity. Fitzmyer 1985: 1459 refuses to make a judgment on historicity, calling it impossible to reach a verdict. R. Brown 1994: 514–15 says that the conceptually parallel Mark 14:62 "may be close to the mindset and style of Jesus himself." Though he believes there is no way to determine this for certain (pp. 506–7), the remarks fit with authenticity. Brown even adds the argument that Mark's "you will see" statement is so ambiguous that it is unlikely to be created by the church.

3 On Pilate, see the exegesis of 3:1. Tacitus, Annals 15.44, mentions Pilate's eventual decision; Fitzmyer 1985: 1474. Kinman 1991 considers the setting to be the assize of the Roman governor; Pilate's presence fits this custom. R. Brown 1994: 363–72 has a detailed discussion of the issue of capital punishment, noting that Jews had no authority to execute, except perhaps those who entered prohibited sections of the temple or committed adultery (John 7:53–8:11; m. Sanh. 7.2). John 18:13 thus fits the legal situation of Jesus' time. On Pilate's career in current literature, see R. Brown 1994: 694–705.

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 1474 and Delling, TDNT 6:279, note that twenty-four uses of πλῆθος (company) are in Luke–Acts, with only one in Mark and none in Matthew. The combination ἅπαν (or πᾶν) τὸ πλῆθος (the whole company) is found in Luke 1:10; 8:37; 19:37; Acts 15:12; 25:24; Marshall 1978: 852. The idea of leading Jesus to Pilate shows the use of ἄγω for taking a criminal somewhere (Matt. 10:18; Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §303; BAGD 14 §2; BAA 25 §2).

8 Fitzmyer 1985: 1475 notes that the title King of the Jews was bestowed on Herod by an Essene named Manaēmos; Josephus, Antiquities 15.10.5 §373.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1479 calls ἀναπέμπω Lucan, but since three of its five NT uses are in this one pericope (elsewhere Acts 25:21 and Philem. 12), the usage is too concentrated and too rare to attribute to Luke. On the Roman legalities, see R. Brown 1994: 764–65.

3 "In those days" is a frequent Lucan expression: Luke 1:39; 6:12; 24:18; Acts 1:15; 11:27; Fitzmyer 1985: 1481. On the racial origins of the Herodians as half-Jewish, see Josephus, Antiquities 14.15.2 §403. On Herod's presence in Jerusalem during a feast, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.3 §122.

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1491 notes Luke's similar though distinct use of double vocatives in 10:41; 13:34; 22:31.

11 Ἐπικρίνω can have the technical meaning "to issue a sentence" (2 Macc. 4:47; 3Macc. 4:2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1492; Plummer 1896: 527), although it was also used of determining whether a person was fit for military service or exempt from a poll tax (MM 240).

21 In some church tradition, the confessing criminal's name is given as Dismas or Dysmas; Acts of Pilate 10.2 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512); Fitzmyer 1985: 1509. See n. 11.

37 Fitzmyer 1985: 1518 notes, however, that Thucydides 2.28 records an eclipse at new moon.

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

7 While much speculation centers around the Shroud of Turin, recent tests date it to the fourteenth century (when it first surfaced), thus making it inauthentic. See Fitzmyer 1985: 1527–29 for the history of the shroud.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1533–34 sees apologetic accretions in Matthew's reference to the guards and the chief priest's bribes. These pericopes do not, however, indicate ahistoricity; they simply clarify why one should not doubt the claims of Jesus' resurrection. Just because they are apologetic does not mean that they are fabricated.

1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1557–59 notes four Lucan emphases: (1) the geographic journey, (2) Jesus' gradual revelation of himself, (3) Christology and fulfillment of OT prophecy, and (4) the meal scenes. (Fitzmyer describes the meal as “eucharistic”; although there is breaking of bread and thanksgiving, it is not a Eucharist, especially given the absence of wine.)

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1556–57 notes four other types of appearance narratives: (1) lists of witnesses (1 Cor. 15:5–8), (2) statements of appearance (Luke 24:34), (3) concise narratives that briefly report the appearance and usually involve situation, appearance, greeting, recognition, and word of command (Matt. 28:8–10), and (4) mixed narratives or developed reports (Luke 24:36–49). This is a variation of Dodd’s 1955 delineation of three categories of narrative: concise, circumstantial, and mixed.

6 BDR §423.2.7 and §423.1.2 notes that Luke uses the temporal genitive absolute fifty-seven times, while Acts has it one hundred times. The construction occurs in Matthew fifty-one times and in Mark thirty-four times. This is too common to attribute its presence to any one evangelist or to rule out its presence in the tradition (against Fitzmyer 1985: 1574 and Nolland 1993b: 1212).

7 The term ἔστη (he stood) appears in John 20:19, 26; 21:4. Luke likes the phrase ἐν μέσῳ (in the midst): Luke 2:46; 8:7; 10:3; 21:21; 22:27, 55; Acts 1:15; 2:22; 4:7; 17:22; 27:21 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1575).

10 Fitzmyer 1985: 1576 refuses to make a connection to 1 Cor. 15, probably to emphasize that Luke is not concerned with Paul’s detailed explanation, a point that is correct but need not mean the accounts are theologically unrelated.

18 The meaning of οὕτως is not clear (Marshall 1978: 905). Fitzmyer 1985: 1583 argues that it means “so” the Scripture speaks, referring to the manner of the message and thus focusing on its content. It could also be causative (Klostermann 1929: 242, pointing to 24:26), thus meaning "because" the Scripture must be fulfilled. Either possibility makes good sense; the second emphasizes design a little more.

5 For example, Chwolson's 1908 work (view six below) was first published in 1892, three decades before the start of form criticism, so that Fitzmyer's appeal to form-critical analysis is challenged. Some of the arguments in this debate are lexical and so are unrelated to any solid results emerging from form criticism. Apparently, Fitzmyer has Luke's additional cup in mind when he discusses form criticism. Some see Luke's mention of the additional cup as evidence of liturgical expansion by the later church.

34 Wiefel 1988: 80. These texts show that God used women as revelatory agents. Several texts, including Luke 2:36–38, have audiences that include both men and women. There is no indication in the Bible that prophetesses had a gender-restricted audience. In fact, the recording of their prophecies for all to read suggests the opposite. On Luke and women, see Flanagan 1978: 292–93, who notes thirteen Lucan texts where man and woman are paralleled as Simeon and Anna are here; Nolland 1989: 122.

20 Giblin 1985: 56 sees Ps. 137:9; Ezek. 4:1–2; and Isa. 3:26 as relevant. He notes that Jerusalem falls as any worldly city would because they missed the "moment of truth." See also Flückiger 1972: 387–88. Nolland 1993b: 931–32 notes the numerous examples of non-Lucan language in Luke 19:43–44.

3 Longenecker 1970: 71–74 cites the example of Simeon ben Kosebah, who, though seen as messianic, had a reticence to claim the title for himself; also Flusser 1959: 107.

17 Foerster, TDNT 3:670, notes that the combination to raise up a horn does not appear in the LXX.

22 The terms ῥύομαι (to rescue) and σῴζω (to save) occasionally appear together to express the idea of deliverance; Foerster, TDNT 7:990–91; Kasch, TDNT 6:1002; Ps. 7:1–2 [7:2–3 LXX]; 71:2 [70:2 LXX].

26 Foerster, TDNT 2:813. Kasch, TDNT 6:1002, notes that rescue in the NT always refers to God as the rescuer. Rescue texts have strong OT roots; seven of seventeen NT uses of ῥύομαι have OT influence: Luke 1:74; Matt. 27:43; Rom. 11:26; 2 Cor. 1:10a; 2 Thess. 3:2; 2 Tim. 3:11; 4:17.

11 Foerster and Fohrer, TDNT 7:1015–24. Foerster (7:1015 n. 63) regards the phrase who is Christ the Lord as a possible Lucan explanatory gloss. See Acts 5:31 and 13:23 and the related ruler ideas in Acts 3:15 and 7:35. The variety of traditions drawing on the concept is against a gloss here.

9 Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; Matt. 3:7 [the parallel to this pericope]; Luce 1933: 110; Danker 1988: 86; SB 1:114–15; Foerster, TDNT 2:815–16. Acts 28:3 refers to a poisonous snake.

15 Liefeld 1984: 864; Schulz 1972: 187 n. 98; Foerster, TDNT 5:486; Manson 1949: 44. The picture of the “high mountain” is almost regal imagery and recalls how rulers often lived high on a mountain over their subjects. Such “heavenly journeys” are not unusual: 2 Cor. 12:2–3. C. F. Evans 1990: 258 cites as parallel Deut. 34:1–4, where Moses sees the promised land from a mountain.

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 (“spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming”); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279. In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

13 Foerster, TDNT 2:8–9. Marshall 1978: 193 notes this contrasts to Jesus, the Holy One, in 4:34.

7 BAGD 189; BAA 379–80; Foerster, TDNT 7:990 §D.II.1a. Of eight NT uses of διασῴζω, six are in Luke–Acts: Matt. 14:36; 1 Pet. 3:20; Luke 7:3; Acts 23:24; 27:43, 44; 28:1, 4; Plummer 1896: 195.

39 Foerster, TDNT 2:80, speaks of this as the end of Satan’s right to accuse humans; but the fall means much more than this.

36 A water snake is probably referred to by ὄφις, since this snake was used as bait for fishing; see Grundmann 1963: 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 915; Foerster, TDNT 5:566–68.

37 Marshall 1978: 496 notes five explanations offered for the Matthean-Lucan difference and opts for each Gospel representing different strands of oral tradition; see also Foerster, TDNT 5:579–80.

27 Jesus’ allusion to the beginning of the world (Foerster, TDNT 3:1029; Hauck, TDNT 3:620; Matt. 13:35; Heb. 4:3; 9:26) makes the expression a merism: “the whole line of prophets.”

13 The hapax legomenon ἀσώτως speaks of a debauched, profligate life (BAGD 119; BAA 239; Prov. 7:11; 28:7), and so Luke 15:30 speaks of the son's time with prostitutes. Conceptual parallels are found in Eph. 5:18; Titus 1:6; 1 Pet. 4:4; Creed 1930: 199; Foerster, TDNT 1:507, esp. n. 4.

11 Foerster and Fohrer, TDNT 7:1015–24. Foerster (7:1015 n. 63) regards the phrase who is Christ the Lord as a possible Lucan explanatory gloss. See Acts 5:31 and 13:23 and the related ruler ideas in Acts 3:15 and 7:35. The variety of traditions drawing on the concept is against a gloss here.

17 Such a "pattern" rendering of OT events fits the OT prophetic hope, where the message of a prophet is read in light of a larger context of the book or in light of the whole of the OT. It is biblical typology in the proper sense of the term; Foulkes 1958 and Goppelt 1982. For more on the hermeneutics of the OT use in the NT, see Bock 1985.

43 Luke 7:11–17; 17:12–19; Wink 1968: 44; Jeremias, TDNT 2:928–41; France 1971: 48.

6 On this passage and various views on the authenticity issue, see also Roloff 1970: 55–62; Lohse, TDNT 7:21–24; Lohse 1960: 84–85; Daube 1972–73: 7–8; and France 1971: 46–47.

17 For discussion of options, but with a different solution, see France 1971: 91 n. 31, who sees all the allusions in Malachi referring to God. Mal. 4:3 [3:21 MT] may point to Messiah, but a clear reference does not exist; Bock 1987: 322 n. 87.

40 For refutation of France's attempt (1971: 227–39) to tie this remark to a.d. 70, see Marshall 1978: 776–77, who notes that the presence of cosmic signs, the force of Dan. 7:13, and the context all argue against such a view. Marshall also defends the saying's authenticity and rightly questions attempts to reject the saying because of the Synoptic mixture of OT text (Ps. 110 and Dan. 7) or by holding that other sayings such as Mark 8:38 or 14:62 are earlier. Colpe, TDNT 8:450, and Perrin 1967: 173–85 deny authenticity; Hooker 1967: 148–59 and Borsch 1967: 361–64 defend it.

4 Judaism also had hopes of priestly messianic figures; see 1QS 9.11 and Neusner, Green, and Frerichs 1987.

21 Exod. 13:2; Num. 3:12; Schürmann 1969: 104 n. 43; Fitzmyer 1981: 407–8; Frey 1930; Michaelis, TDNT 6:876–77 and n. 36; Bovon 1989: 121 n. 38.

4 Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 48 (= Friedlander 1916: 378), an eighth-century text that is too late to be of real help; R. Brown 1977: 369. Gen. 21:3 may belong here in light of Gen. 21:4–5, but it is hard to be sure; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:82.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

6 Friedrich, TDNT 6:835 §D.III.2, notes that Elizabeth is filled with the Spirit and cries out like a prophet, actions parallel to Anna in Luke 2 and to Zechariah in his hymn; see also Delling, TDNT 6:130.

12 Friedrich, TDNT 6:835. Again, the Spirit serves as "testimony bearer" and "revelator"; Acts 2:17–18; 11:27; 13:1; 19:6; 21:9; Nolland 1989: 85. On the Lucan theme of the Spirit as the Spirit of prophecy, see Menzies 1991: 119–22.

9 Friedrich, TDNT 2:721. The tie between humans and good news appears in a variety of texts: Matt. 26:13; 28:19; Acts 1:8; Mark 14:9; 16:15; Sasse, TDNT 3:890.

33 Marshall 1978: 197; Ernst 1977: 182; Hendriksen 1978: 269–70. See the exegesis of 4:35a for fuller discussion. Other demonic confessions are Mark 1:24; 3:11; 5:7; Luke 4:34; 8:28; Acts 16:17; 19:15; Matt. 8:29; Friedrich, TDNT 3:708; Grundmann, TDNT 3:900 §B1.

36 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, notes that such ability was seen as prophetic by later Judaism.

11 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, lists a few late Jewish and Christian texts that indicate a prophet's discernment: Pseudo-Clement, Homilies

2.6.1; 3.11.2; 3.13.1–2 (where a true prophet is said to be the “one who knows all things”); Lev. Rab. 21.8 on 16:3 (where Rabbi Akiva “sees … in the Holy Spirit” that one of his pupils has received a message from home telling him to marry).

13 Manson 1949: 83–84. Friedrich, TDNT 6:847, argues that the office of eschatological prophet was the issue. Matthew’s discussion of David seems to envision something more; for a discussion of the test, Rengstorf, TDNT 7:234.

10 Jeremias, TDNT 5:714, notes that a false prophet ran the risk of being killed (m. Sanh. 11.1). Friedrich, TDNT 6:834–35, points to Matt. 23:37. See also Fischel 1946.

13 Friedrich, TDNT 6:840, argues that the meaning is that they prophesied about John, but the passage’s temporal markers are against this view.

14 On “the law and the prophets,” see Luke 16:29, 31; Acts 13:15; 28:23; Schrenk, TDNT 1:756 n. 28; Friedrich, TDNT 6:832.

5 Marshall 1978: 125–26. One can only note the restraint in this account compared to the apocryphal gospels. In contrast, the Jesus Seminar puts Jesus’ saying in 2:49 in black type (meaning that it does not go back to Jesus); Funk and Hoover 1993: 275–76. They see the unit as Luke’s production, drawing on the child-prodigy genre, the Lucan emphasis on design, and its lack of attestation elsewhere. But these criteria ignore the potential of a unique source surfacing in Luke’s research and the evidence for the unit’s origins in Palestinian settings (see the discussion above and n. 3). Its enigmatic expression also reflects Jesus’ style (see also Nolland 1989: 127–28, who speaks less directly on the issue of historicity in 2:49). That this is the only use of δεῖ relating Jesus to the Father speaks against a Lucan origin. On the historicity of the entire scene, see the exegesis of 2:50.

11 Gospel of the Ebionites in Epiphanius, Panarion 30.13.7–8; Gospel of the Hebrews in Jerome, Commentary on Isaiah §4 (on Isa. 11:2); Gospel of the Nazareans in Jerome, Against the Pelagians 3.2; Funk 1985: 1.316; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.169, 177, 160.

1 Plummer 1896: 106; Manson 1949: 46 (who strongly defends this view); Dupont 1968: 97–115 (who argues for a middle course between literalism and parable); Carson 1984: 111; Nolland 1989: 177 (who defends the plausibility of Jesus' reporting this event to his disciples). On the other end of the spectrum apparently is Crossan (1991), who does not even discuss this event in his portrayal of Jesus. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 133–34 [Matt.], 278–80 [Luke]) places all the sayings of this unit in black type, thereby indicating rejection of a tie to Jesus. The consensus of the seminar is that the text is legendary, like Greco-Roman biography, and that the sayings were authored by Q following the LXX. The seminar calls it an "ordeal story," but this generic form category does not explain the explicit uniqueness of this confrontation account, a point that negates this argument. Manson 1949: 45–46 rightly challenges the description of the account as legendary (see the discussion of form below). LXX citations reflect only Luke's sensitivity to his Greek audience and are not evidence of the text's origin, since MT renderings would work (Nolland 1989: 177).

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

1 Bultmann 1963: 25–26, 64, 68 opts for a pronouncement story, but also notes the absence of any pronouncement. Jesus' response comes in his simply turning away. This makes a pronouncement account unlikely and explains why the Jesus Seminar makes no comment on the text in The Five Gospels (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316).

1 Dibelius 1934: 160–61, esp. 160 n. 1, says that the general nature of the remark shows that it comes from the evangelist, but how "general principles” can come from the evangelist is not clear. It is the unique attestation of this saying in Luke that appears to be the only reason for this conclusion, along with its possible use of OT imagery from Gen. 19:26. The Jesus Seminar sees these verses as going back to Luke, claiming that the saying assumes too much self-identity for disciples (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316 prints it in black type). But the distinctive behavior and identity are already indicated in the first two sayings, which the seminar accepts. On the rejection of other attempts to argue that the early church is responsible for the sayings, see Marshall 1978: 409, in particular his evaluation of Schulz 1972: 435 n. 239, who relies on Dibelius. Glombitza 1971 also makes a case for Lucan creation.

3 Bultmann 1963: 145 sees much of this material as church formulated and as regulations for the church. Beare 1970 rejects the mission and the discourse’s historicity, as does the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 317–23, esp. 320).

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis’s); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

3 The Gospel of Thomas 63, 72 has parallel material, but §63 is not primary, as B. Scott 1989: 130–31 correctly argues. However, Scott wrongly asserts that the separation of the question and the parable in the Gospel of Thomas shows that Luke put these two elements together (with Scott, Funk and Hoover 1993: 338 argue that 12:15 was written by Luke, printing it in black type). The Gospel of Thomas lacks any warning, and so is only conceptually parallel. In addition, the general nature of the Gospel of Thomas is to work with only one short saying at a time.

5 But so Schulz 1972: 301–9; rightly refuted by Marshall 1978: 559–60. Multiple levels of the parable tradition (see n. 1 above) teach the kingdom's gradual growth and contrastive transformation. In addition, even the parables of this section appear in various wings of the tradition (Mark and Q [or Matthew]), so that multiple attestation speaks for authenticity. Jeremias 1963a: 146 n. 68 notes the Palestinian coloring in the parables, a point in favor of authenticity. Even the Jesus Seminar accepts the essential authenticity of these parables, printing 13:18–19 in pink type and 13:20–21 in red (Funk and Hoover 1993: 346–47).

1 Also Schulz 1972: 391–98; Crossan 1973: 72; Fitzmyer 1985: 1052. Jeremias 1963a: 63–64, 176 argues that the Gospel of Thomas may be more original than Matthew, except for its expansion of excuses. The Thomas parable is closer to Luke than to Matthew and so is often discussed with Luke's version, but it introduces a fourth figure who cannot come to the banquet. Thomas gives no setting, since the document is just a list of teachings. But the excuses in Thomas use more urban imagery; Luke's use of agrarian imagery fits Jesus' tendency to use agrarian illustrations. Horsley 1987: 180 sees Luke as the more original of the versions, noting that the economically prosperous are the excluded; so also the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 352), though it regards the symposium-table setting as Lucan.

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

4 Soards 1987: 96 mentions 22:39a–b, 40b, 42 as the minimum (he excludes 22:43–44 on textual grounds). Ernst 1977: 607 and Goulder 1989: 741–42 make the best case for additional sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 329 rejects the originality of 22:43–44. For discussion of how the prayer's contents could be known when the disciples are some distance away and asleep, see R. Brown 1994: 174. The Jesus Seminar rejects the historicity of the material on the premise that no one heard the prayer (Funk and Hoover 1993: 391). Brown calls such an objection to historicity a "low level" approach and suggests that the disciples need not have been asleep at this point, although later he suggests that they did not need to hear the prayer because they knew how Jesus prayed. Either explanation is possible. Brown regards the prayer and the event as certain (p. 234), but is less confident of knowledge of the exact words (p. 225). I prefer the view that the event drove the meaning and form of the tradition.

4 J. Green 1988: 282 calls Luke the most primitive form of the tradition. Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–59 is agnostic on historicity, saying that it is impossible to prove. The most detailed English study, Catchpole 1971: 153–220, gives the nod to Luke. For a more skeptical appraisal, giving seven reasons not to accept these accounts as authentic, see E. Sanders 1985: 296–99. For a detailed response to most of his objections, see Bock 1994b. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 392–93) rejects Jesus' prediction (22:61) and the trial dialogue (22:67–69, 70) as inauthentic because 22:61 recalls 22:34 and the absence of disciples at the trial means that no witnesses were present. Jesus' anticipation of Peter's failure, however, reflects his knowledge of how pressure would cause Peter to wilt (the disciples' past record of inconsistency might also contribute to Jesus' expectation). The presence of people like Joseph of Arimathea at the trial makes an internal witness possible.

2 This motive is questionable, since such abruptness did not stop Luke from launching right into a question in 22:67. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1994: 394) takes a similar position, with a more skeptical twist, arguing that the charges are simply created from Scripture in anticipation of 23:38. But a sociopolitical cause for Jesus' crucifixion is a historical certainty. Enough people were present at such a hearing that summaries of its content could become available.

3 The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 397–98) illustrates a more detached approach, arguing that "words ascribed to Jesus after his death are not subject to historical verification" and that claims that Jesus spoke after his death are "beyond the limits of historical assessment." The variation in location and wording thus lead the seminar to print Jesus' reported promise (24:7) in black type. This total skepticism seems to emerge from the seminar's definitional stance and an unwillingness to allow for any degree of summary reporting in the Gospel accounts. For a good attempt to explain both the Galilean and the Jerusalem appearances, see Nolland 1993b: 1181.

3 H. Betz 1969 also strongly argues for "cult legend." According to Betz the account teaches the resurrection's importance for Christian faith. Similar in tone is the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 398–99), which prints 24:17, 19, 25 in black type and says that all the dialogue is "provided by the storyteller" and involves instances of the evangelists "inventing words for Jesus that express their own perspectives."

4 Lucan creation is also the view of the Jesus Seminar, which prints 24:44, 46–49 in black type (Funk and Hoover 1993: 400). In the seminar's view, these verses represent a third commission (Matt. 28:18–20; John 20:22–23). Nolland 1993b: 1225–26 also sees a Lucan development here, though (unlike the Jesus Seminar) he argues that it is a natural development of the tradition that Jesus appeared for a limited time. Nolland says that connection to tradition is possible, but not demonstrable. I prefer to see roots in a tradition and a real event, since Luke does not discuss new scenes elsewhere in his Gospel without the prompting of tradition.

4 Creed 1930: 37–38 mentions these associations and rejects them, as do Bultmann 1963: 299–300 and Schürmann 1969: 131 n. 244. The comparison was described by Aufhauser 1926 and defended by Garbe 1959: 47–49, but there are just too many differences between these accounts.

40 Van Der Loos 1965: 78–79, 110–13 notes that not all disease is possession nor is all possession disease. On the distinction between miracles and magic, see Witherington 1990: 156–60; on Luke's antimagic polemic, see Garrett 1989, who defers from answering any historical questions, staying at the literary level.

19 Dodd 1947: 49 argues that all the language is from the OT, as does Gaston 1970: 359, citing a catena of verses: Jer. 8:18; 9:1; 6:14, 6, 15, 8. Manson 1949: 319–20 cites Jer. 8:18–22, although the whole of Jer. 8:13–22, along with Jer. 6:6–21 and Isa. 29:1–4, might also be relevant. See also Plummer 1896: 451–52. Tiede 1980: 68–86 challenges Gaston's view that Luke has four stages here: salvation to part of Israel, fulfillment of threat, salvation to Gentiles, and the end. He sees a theodicy in Luke–Acts, where Luke explains how Jerusalem crumbled and yet Luke argues that God still will be faithful by restoring Israel. This is quite possible, though Tiede argues for a post–a.d. 70 date for the book, which is less likely.

23 M. Power 1912 mentions this approach, while Cortés and Gatti 1970 and Bover 1951 suppose that the missing saying was that Jesus told his parents he would remain in Jerusalem, but they had not understood him on that point.

18 So also Godet in the third French edition of his commentary, but not in the English translations of his earlier French editions (see Cortés and Gatti 1987: 255 n. 27). Lexical support for this sense comes from the LXX (Gen. 33:11; Judg. 13:15–16; 19:7; 2 Sam. 13:25, 27; 2 Kings 5:23 [variant reading]), the related verb παραβιάζομαι (to urge insistently; Luke 24:29; Acts 16:15), and Koine sources (MM 109–10 and Spicq 1995: 1.290–91).

4 The noun is a hapax legomenon, while the verb occurs in a few, mostly Lucan, texts: Mark 3:2; Luke 6:7; 14:1; 20:20; Acts 9:24. In Gal. 4:10, it has the meaning "legal, ritual observation"; Geiger 1976: 38.

19 Κατὰ τὰ αὐτά (according to the same things) has the same force as καθώς; 6:23, 26; Geiger 1976: 91. Singular ἡμέρᾳ (day) matches 17:22 (but plural) and 17:24 and may be influenced by the comparison with the “day” of Lot. In all three cases, the reference is to the return and its accompanying judgment-vindication. See the additional note for the textual issue.

24 Cf. εὑρίσκω (to find) in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25 and σῴζω (to save) in Luke 9:24 = Mark 8:35. Geiger 1972: 121 speaks of the influence of Ezek. 13:18–19 (which uses περιποιέω), and Zmijewski 1976: 479 n. 56 sees a connection to Exod. 1:17 (which uses ζῳογονέω). Neither LXX reference satisfies, however, since each has only one element of Luke 17:33, and one can hardly argue for a double LXX allusion. In addition, if the LXX alteration is based on an earlier, existing traditional saying, what does it add? Περιποιέω appears only three times in the NT (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13) and the noun περιποίησις is never used in the Gospels (five times elsewhere). Since the conscious shift of terminology appears to have no point, the rare terminology is probably from a source.

19 Hendriksen 1978: 218 (who alludes to eternal generation); Geldenhuys 1951: 147; Marshall 1978: 155–56 (who more cautiously speaks only of a more than Messiah perspective, while refusing to emphasize ontology as such).

28 Leaney 1958: 145; Godet 1875: 1.354–55; Creed 1930: 108; Schürmann 1969: 423–24; Fitzmyer 1981: 680. Geldenhuys 1951: 231 n. 15 notes that the couplet has rhyme in Aramaic.

10 Geldenhuys’s remark assumes Mark’s setting, since Luke does not note that this happened on the day of the parable discourse. His timing is more general. See the next paragraph.

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

25 Geldenhuys 1951: 403: "Because the Saviour has paid with His precious blood for the redemption of man, every soul has an infinite value in God's sight and the way to the throne of grace lies open to everyone who desires to enter."

13 The name Calvary comes from calvaria, the Latin translation of κρανίον; Plummer 1896: 531; Geldenhuys 1951: 613. R. Brown 1994: 938–40 discusses the location of Golgotha and decides for the traditional location associated now with the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in what is called the Christian quarter of Jerusalem. Nolland 1993b: 1145 expresses less certainty about the locale.

17 Any charge today that dispensationalism sees two ways of salvation or sees too great a law/grace contrast in the sermon grossly misrepresents where many of its adherents are now. Such a monolithic view of dispensationalism fails to see the variations that have long been a part of this approach. Gerstner 1991 irresponsibly engages in such confusion and minimizes the significance of such differences, which dispensationalists like C. C. Ryrie and J. D. Pentecost have long noted. Gerstner's charge of antinomianism is a distortion that warps his ability to appreciate the distinctions in the movement. The charge also underestimates the significance of the current discussion about the function of the law within covenant theology, as well as its debate with theonomy; see D. Turner 1991; J. Martin 1986; and J. Martin 1992.

37 Creed 1930: 19; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 49–50; Fitzmyer 1981: 348–50; Wiefel 1988: 51–52; Ernst 1977: 72; R. Brown 1977: 309. Gewiess, in an appendix to Laurentin's German 1967 edition, interestingly takes a view opposite of Laurentin in the French original and omits Laurentin's own discussion of the question.

4 Marshall 1978: 405 notes that the Hebrew idiom may suggest a source behind Luke's remarks. Appealing to Ezek. 6:2; 13:17; 15:7; 20:46 [21:2 MT], C. A. Evans 1987a argues that the force is "to dispatch," a view possible for the term but awkward for this context. In a reworking of this article in Evans and Sanders 1993: 93–105, Evans makes less of the lexical argument and argues for an allusion to Ezek. 21:2–6 [21:7–11 MT], with the implication that with the journey comes not only destined suffering for Jesus but also judgment for Israel (he also adds Ezek. 25:2; 28:21; 29:2; and 38:2, while emphasizing the parallel in 20:46 [21:2 MT]; p. 100). If so, then Jesus' act is like that of the prophet and has a place in the divine drama of Israel's history. This view is possible, but not certain. For a denial of judgment here, see Giblin 1985: 31–32.

20 Giblin 1985: 56 sees Ps. 137:9; Ezek. 4:1–2; and Isa. 3:26 as relevant. He notes that Jerusalem falls as any worldly city would because they missed the "moment of truth." See also Flückiger 1972: 387–88. Nolland 1993b: 931–32 notes the numerous examples of non-Lucan language in Luke 19:43–44.

1 On allegorical parables, see Derrett 1974; Blomberg 1982a: 6–8; Carlston 1981; and Klauck 1978. On the parable's interpretive history, see Snodgrass 1983: 3–11, who defends authenticity (pp. 2, 87, 103–4, 108, 112). Giblin 1985: 65–66 does not see allegory as a distinct genre of parables, but speaks of the parable's allegorical bent. See also excursus 8, where parable and allegory are seen as part of a literary continuum.

14 Arguing that the point revolves around both the image and the inscription, Giblin 1971 attempts to ground the reply in an allusion to Isa. 44:5. According to this verse, God's inscription on people is that they "belong to him," a concept that leads Jesus to speak of rendering to God what is his. Marshall 1978: 736 is right that this is a correct theological deduction but not explicit in the text.

18 C. Turner 1925–26: 113–25; Glickman 1983: 86–87. Stegner 1989: 15–31 stresses this Genesis connection over the regal motifs, tying ἀγαπητός to the Jewish motifs of the binding of Isaac. Currently, this may well be the most popular explanation. Gen. 22:2 is also mentioned as having the same basic phrase, though the expression there is in the accusative case. Other LXX uses of this phrase occur in Jer. 6:26; Amos 8:10; and Zech. 12:10.

14 Glickman 1983: 226–27. Nolland 1989: 179 says that the test is exploitation of Jesus' privilege of sonship, since the Son has access to the powers of the Father. "Son of God" here has a special force for Jesus' unique filial relationship to God, since Jesus can access such power. But C. F. Evans 1990: 258 ties υἱός to 3:22, so that it means "servant of God" or

“king.” Nolland’s view is more likely. Satan is not testing regal authority, but something more significant.

25 Plummer 1896: 113 raises the suggestion, but is not sure of it, while Glickman 1983: 234 is for it.

5 On the use of φωνή (voice), see Luke 11:27; Acts 4:24; Gen. 39:15, 18; Judg. 21:2; 1 Sam. 11:4; Van Der Loos 1965: 496 n. 4; Klostermann 1929: 173. The call for mercy is also used in the Psalter (e.g., 109:21; Glö;ckner 1983: 139–40), but not much can be made of this general expression, as Nolland 1993a: 846 indicates.

1 Dibelius 1934: 160–61, esp. 160 n. 1, says that the general nature of the remark shows that it comes from the evangelist, but how “general principles” can come from the evangelist is not clear. It is the unique attestation of this saying in Luke that appears to be the only reason for this conclusion, along with its possible use of OT imagery from Gen. 19:26. The Jesus Seminar sees these verses as going back to Luke, claiming that the saying assumes too much self-identity for disciples (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316 prints it in black type). But the distinctive behavior and identity are already indicated in the first two sayings, which the seminar accepts. On the rejection of other attempts to argue that the early church is responsible for the sayings, see Marshall 1978: 409, in particular his evaluation of Schulz 1972: 435 n. 239, who relies on Dibelius. Glombitza 1971 also makes a case for Lucan creation.

24 Luke does not cite the text explicitly, but summarizes. This is not a softening of the reference, but his typical effort to shorten and summarize.

For studies on the use and interpretation of Isa. 6:9–10 in Judaism and the early church, see Hesse 1955; Gnilka 1961; C. A. Evans 1989c.

33 Zechariah asks “how shall I know this?” versus Mary’s “how can this be?” Zechariah asks for a sign; Godet 1875: 1.92; Plummer 1896: 24; Schürmann 1969: 49.

7 Godet 1875: 1.100–101 may overstate the case, but his point about the exposure of the populace to the Psalter is well taken; Hendriksen 1978: 101.

23 Danker 1988: 43–44; Ellis 1974: 76; Klostermann 1929: 20; Godet 1875: 1.104–5; Plummer 1896: 33; Marshall 1978: 84. It must be remembered that Luke presented the passage as Mary’s words, so he must expect them to be read prophetically. Here is another failure of the view (1b) that argues for a reference to Jesus’ work in the past.

37 Godet 1875: 1.115. Bovon 1989: 108 n. 74 notes that the expression forgiveness of sins is like neither the OT nor the Christian expression. Jewish usage does occur: Philo, Life of Moses 2.29 §147; Special Laws 1.35 §190; Josephus, Antiquities 6.5.6 §92 (which discusses God’s reaction to Israel’s desire to elect a king in 1 Sam. 12 and the nation’s confession of sin after God revealed his displeasure).

43 This is the point of the connection to Luke 1:77; Godet 1875: 1.117. On the verse as a whole, see Danker 1988: 50–51. C. Schneider, TDNT 3:443, argues that the image is a figure for mourning. Those who sit in darkness are those who mourn the presence of death. Whether this particular picture is present is less likely given the OT background.

50 See discussions in Schürmann 1969: 94–95; Schweizer 1984: 44; R. Brown 1977: 376 n. 2; Bovon 1989: 110. Godet 1875: 1.118 refutes the older view that John was an Essene. The similarity between the two groups suggests that if John did not belong to one group, he probably was not a member of the other either.

25 Hendriksen 1978: 141; Godet 1875: 1.129; Plummer 1896: 52. Schrenk, TDNT 5:1016–17, esp. n. 7, argues similarly. The term οἶκος refers to the whole house of a ruler, while πατριά is added, so that the reference to the whole house is clearly seen as a specific reference to ancestry.

27 K αθώς compares what they heard with what they saw and thus connects only to εἶδον; Godet 1875: 1.134.

32 The KJV reflects a three-part division by reading nominative εὐδοκία; so Godet 1875: 1.132–33. Many recent translations reflect a two-part division by reading genitive εὐδοκίας; so Plummer 1896: 57–58; Fitzmyer 1981: 410–12; and R. Brown 1977: 403–5.

12 Godet 1875: 1.137; Plummer 1896: 65; Fitzmyer 1981: 426. In favor of this view is Cutler 1966. New Testament uses of the name include Luke 3:30; Acts 13:1; 15:14; 2 Pet. 1:1; Rev. 7:7. Simon is a variation of the name.

32 Godet 1875: 1.141–42 argues that the other construction is too violent; that is, too far removed to be likely.

33 John 19:25–27; Godet 1875: 1.141; Hendriksen 1978: 170–71; Marshall 1978: 123. Nolland 1989: 122 cites Ps. 22:20 [22:21 MT]; 37:15; Zech. 12:10; 13:7; and Ps. 37:15 as conceptual background.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n.

66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

3 Godet 1875: 1.255 (who is not shy about seeing distinct events elsewhere); Liefeld 1984: 876. As already noted, Fitzmyer and Schweizer tie the account to John 21.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

11 The view goes back to E. W. Hengstenberg; Godet 1875: 1.306.

25 Godet 1875: 1.311. The structure of Matt. 5:3–12 is similar, though it lacks the woes and thus the explicit addressing of adversaries.

50 BAGD 83–84; BAA 167; Godet 1875: 1.326; Creed 1930: 95; Marshall 1978: 264; Fitzmyer 1981: 640; Schürmann 1969: 355 n. 90; Bultmann, TDNT 2:533–34.

28 Leaney 1958: 145; Godet 1875: 1.354–55; Creed 1930: 108; Schürmann 1969: 423–24; Fitzmyer 1981: 680. Geldenhuys 1951: 231 n. 15 notes that the couplet has rhyme in Aramaic.

39 Luke 3:18 and 6:6 seem to ignore any clean distinction. In favor of the distinction are Godet 1875: 1.345 and Plummer 1896: 202; against it are Elliott 1969 and BDF §306.

10 1 Cor. 11:5–6; Godet 1875: 1.358. Jeremias 1963a: 126 n. 57 notes that such action in later times could bring grounds for divorce; see *t. Soṭa*5.9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 3.168) and y. Giṭ. 50d (9.11) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 25.254).

17 Plummer cites Socrates' phrase as πάνυ ὀρθῶς; so also Godet 1875: 1.359 and Bovon 1989: 393 n. 53. However, no reference is given in any of these sources. A check of Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, an electronic database containing most of the extant ancient Greek literature, did not surface the phrase in Socrates. This classical comparison should not be made until the texts are revealed. However, the general rhetorical pattern does fit a type of Socratic interrogation; see Daube 1956: 152; Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.18.2.

22 Godet 1875: 1.386 implausibly suggests that Jesus was offended by the swine. For someone who declared all foods clean, this was hardly an issue.

3 On the placement of the account, see Godet 1875: 1.396–97. This explains how the disciples knew how people saw Jesus.

6 So Arndt 1956: 254 argues for two Bethsaidas; otherwise Fitzmyer 1981: 765–66; Godet 1875: 1.404–5 (who sees many places with this name along the lake, since the name is a generic description); Ptolemy, Geography 5.16.4. Cf. Josephus's use of "Gaulanite" in Antiquities 18.1.1 §4 and "Galilean" in 18.1.6 §23. A region is addressed, not just a populated locale, as the dilemma about food makes clear. Bethsaida may be nothing more than temporary "headquarters" for mission in the region. Arndt and Godet may be right about the Marcan reference being a distinct locale using a generic name. John 12:21 may confirm the distinction.

18 This is the view that Hoehner 1977: 21–22 adopts, while Godet 1875: 1.124 calls it unlikely for Luke.

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

4 Matthew elsewhere (14:23; 15:29) uses ὄρος to refer to hills; Carson 1984: 129. Luke's πεδινός is not a prairie, but can be a plateau in the mountains: Jer. 21:13; Isa. 13:2; Godet 1875: 1.295; BAGD 638; BAA 1287. See the discussion of sources and historicity in Luke 6:17–19.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

10 Other unlikely options are “Master of the complaint,” “Lord of dung,” or “Baal, the Flame”; Fitzmyer 1985: 920; Godet 1875: 2.60; Marshall 1978: 473; and Ernst 1977: 374.

17 The phrase οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν refers to “your own people” (Arndt 1956: 300), although most see it as referring to the “sons of the Pharisees” (Rengstorf, TDNT 4:443) or more broadly to “countrymen” (Godet 1875: 2.64) (see BAGD 833 §1cα; BAA 1663 §1cα; Heb. 12:5; 1 Pet. 5:13). Nolland 1993a: 639 states the question this way: “What will other Jewish exorcists, in light of their own exorcizing activity, make of such a view?” For a different (and I think more preferable) view, see n. 19 below.

19 Godet 1875: 2.64 notes that W. M. L. de Wette and H. A. W. Meyer held this view in the nineteenth century. Shirock 1992 now ably defends this view, noting that it was the view of Chrysostom, Homilies on Matthew 41 (on Matt. 12:25–26). He gives six reasons for the view, the most compelling of which I note on p. 1078. If this view is correct, a major reason for separating 11:19 from 11:20 in the original tradition—namely, the difference in meaning of “you” in each verse—disappears. Evidence of the presence God’s kingdom is seen in Jesus and his followers. If this is the argument, Jesus is noting evidence of God’s grace in Israel!

2 Egelkraut 1976: 93 n. 1 argues that the question of 11:38 does not match the answer of 11:39 and thus Luke created the introduction (but see the exegesis of 11:38). Taking 11:39 as indicating the original setting, Marshall 1978: 492 argues that it is Matthew who shifted to a Mark 12 setting. He argues that Luke does not conflate sources, while Matthew has many topical rearrangements; so also Godet 1875: 2.87.

3 Godet does not note the Marcan connection, but does cite Luke 20:45–47 as showing awareness of a critique at the temple. The situation is little different for Matthean prioritists, since the question is why does Luke have here what Matthew and Mark have much later in Jesus' ministry? Any attempt to argue that Luke reflects the original tradition suffers from the Matthean and Marcan agreement in timing, if all are working with the same source material. Why would both Matthew and Mark diverge from an alleged earlier placement? Distinct traditions are more likely, since it is also hard to explain Luke's placement if all he had was Mark or Matthew. Even if Luke supplied the meal setting, the question remains, why did the event occur so early outside of Jerusalem?

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew?

The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

18 So also Godet in the third French edition of his commentary, but not in the English translations of his earlier French editions (see Cortés and Gatti 1987: 255 n. 27). Lexical support for this sense comes from the LXX (Gen. 33:11; Judg. 13:15–16; 19:7; 2 Sam. 13:25, 27; 2 Kings 5:23 [variant reading]), the related verb παραβιάζομαι (to urge insistently; Luke 24:29; Acts 16:15), and Koine sources (MM 109–10 and Spicq 1995: 1.290–91).

17 Marshall 1978: 555 cites the refusal in Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 and the small yield in ›Abot de Rabbi Nathan A.16 (= Goldin 1955: 86).

9 Prov. 25:6–7 (NRSV) says, "Do not put yourself forward in the king's presence / or stand in the place of the great; / for it is better to be told,

‘Come up here,’ / than to be put lower in the presence of a noble.” For Jewish parallels, see Sir. 3:17–20; 4:8; 12:11; 29:5; Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (fifth century); ›Abot de Rabbi Nathan A.25 (= Goldin 1955: 110); Bultmann 1963: 104; Fitzmyer 1985: 1047; SB 1:916.

6 Blomberg 1990: 205 argues for a parable since the phrase a certain man is often used in Jesus’ parables as well as rabbinic parables. Blomberg also notes that the story shares the three-point structure of other parables (e.g., 14:16). Against a parable is Gooding 1987: 277, who argues that parables deal with actual things and activities in the world, not things such as the afterlife directly.

17 Such a “pattern” rendering of OT events fits the OT prophetic hope, where the message of a prophet is read in light of a larger context of the book or in light of the whole of the OT. It is biblical typology in the proper sense of the term; Foulkes 1958 and Goppelt 1982. For more on the hermeneutics of the OT use in the NT, see Bock 1985.

1 On the Jewish expectations of either a political kingdom or a kingdom coming directly and apocalyptically from God, see Goppelt 1981–82: 1.45–51 and Ladd 1974b: 60–63. Matt. 13:11 calls this gradual growth part of the “mystery” of the kingdom. Matt. 13:52 shows that the kingdom promise contains both new and old things side by side, indicating that NT kingdom revelation supplements and complements OT revelation. Beasley-Murray 1986: 194–201 lists the parables of growth in the Synoptics: mustard seed and leaven (Luke 13:18–21 = Matt. 13:31–33 = Mark 4:30–32), seed growing secretly (Mark 4:26–29), sower (Luke 8:4–8 = Matt. 13:1–9 = Mark 4:1–9), wheat and tares (Matt. 13:24–30), and the dragnet (Matt. 13:47–50).

9 Ῥαββί is used in Matt. 26:25; Mark 9:5; 11:21; Matt. 26:49 = Mark 14:45; John 1:38 (plus seven more times in John's Gospel); διδάσκαλος in Luke 7:40; 8:49; 9:38; 10:25; 11:45; 12:13; 18:18; 19:39; 20:21, 28, 39; 21:7; 22:11 (Matthew and Mark use this term twelve times each). See Goppelt 1981–82: 1.163–64, esp. n. 2.

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

13 Charts detailing the various OT parallels in the hymn can be found in Plummer 1896: 30–31; Klostermann 1929: 18–19; and R. Brown 1977: 358–60. The fullest chart including Qumran parallels is Bemile 1986: 116–33. For the connection to 1 Sam. 2, see Goulder 1989: 225–29, who also notes parallels to Ps. 88 and 102.

41 Marshall 1978: 94–95. On God or his word as light, see 2 Sam. 22:17, 29; Ps. 119:105; Goulder 1989: 242.

23 Marshall 1978: 120. Bovon 1989: 144 notes conceptual parallels in Ps. 31:19 [31:20 MT; 30:19 LXX] and Isa. 64:4–5 [64:3–4 MT]. Nolland 1989: 120 cites Bar. 4:24 and sees Isa. 52:10 as the key point of connection. Goulder 1989: 257 sees Isa. 40:1–5 as the key text.

2 For characteristic approaches to this issue, often appealing to Q, see Klostermann 1929: 50; Creed 1930: 46–48; Schneider 1977a: 82. Bovon 1989: 165–66 speaks of Q, Mark, and other material. Distinctive is Goulder 1989: 271–72, who argues for Luke's use of Matthew.

2 But Goulder 1989: 281–82 sees Luke drawing both on Matthew and to a lesser degree on Mark. Fitzmyer 1981: 479–80 lists five major differences between Mark and Luke: (1) Luke omits references to Jesus' coming from Galilee (Mark 1:9) or being baptized in the Jordan; (2) Luke does not name John (Mark 1:9); (3) Luke uniquely notes Jesus' prayer; (4) Luke has the heaven "open" versus being "rent" (Mark 1:10); and (5) only Luke notes that the Spirit descended "in bodily form" like a dove (with Matt. 3:16). Wiefel 1988: 94–95 notes that Luke uses the singular "heaven" instead of the Semitic plural "heavens."

34 For a defense that most changes are Luke's altering of Matthew, see Goulder 1989: 291–97.

1 Goulder 1989: 299, accepting both omissions as likely explanations, believes that Luke used Mark. For a different view on the kingdom omission based on an alleged Lucan reduction of a connection between the kingdom's coming and repentance, see Conzelmann 1960: 114.

2 Goulder also notes how this fits the use of the phrase their synagogues in Matthew (4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54). On Jesus' authority and teaching, see Matt. 7:29; 11:1. Still, such summaries may not be sourced in Matthew only, but in oral tradition about Jesus' teaching.

8 Bultmann 1963: 31–32 (where he calls the account an apophthegm or pronouncement story, which he believes grew into this full-blown account); Creed 1930: 65; Schneider 1977a: 106–7; Klostermann 1929: 62; Fitzmyer 1981: 527; Tannehill 1972; C. F. Evans 1990: 266–67 (who notes a series of Lucan expressions in the account); Goulder 1989: 299. For a summary of the recent discussion and a full bibliography on this passage, see Schreck 1989, while Corrington 1993 evaluates a redactional reading of this text with other types of readings.

1 So correctly Luce 1933: 193–94, who is not averse to claiming that sayings are nonhistorical, yet defends historicity here. Marshall 1978: 398 notes the OT conceptual parallel in Num. 11:24–30. To be rejected is Goulder's view (1989: 450) that Luke 9:49–50 is really a subtle defense of Paul before the apostles, a view that looks like F. C. Baur reborn. Goulder is right to reject the view that Jesus endorses non-Christian exorcists here. They cannot act in Jesus' name. Luke has in mind those who have responded to Jesus and have sought to minister for him. He encourages such involvement.

4 On the history of this discussion, including the church fathers and the various views, see Orchard and Riley 1987. Goulder's detailed 1989 work is unique, arguing that the order is Mark–Matthew–Luke, but that Luke used only Mark and Matthew, not Q. One of the goals of his study is to challenge the existence of Q.

1 On NT structures with the use of “seven,” see Rengstorf, TDNT 2:632 §B4d. On other points of Lucan structure, see Nolland 1989: 168 and Goulder 1989: 283–90.

2 Because the exact list of names is so uncertain and because Luke says nothing about the structure, one should be cautious about invoking such precise symbolism. Wiefel 1988: 97 seems to regard this twelfth-week view as possible. Schürmann 1969: 203 n. 119 argues that if it is present Luke is not conscious of it. Nolland 1989: 168 suggests that it was the point of Luke’s source, whose order he reversed. But how can one know this? Goulder 1989: 284–85 is strongly supportive of this view, citing 1 Enoch 93.3–10 to stress that the form is to some extent artificial.

4 The amount of material in these groups can be variously measured, depending on the division of the pericopes and one’s judgment about the presence of parallels. Egelkraut 1976: 27 bases the percentages in Luke’s central section (for him 9:51–19:48) on the pericope delineation in two common synopses:

	Lucan Parallels to Matthew (i.e., Q)	Unique Lucan Material	Lucan Parallels to Mark
Aland 1985	26 of 75 pericopes (35%)	27 of 75 pericopes (36%)	22 of 75 pericopes (29%)
Huck and Lietzmann 1936	25 of 60 pericopes (42%)	24 of 60 pericopes (40%)	11 of 60 pericopes (18%)

Resseguie 1975: 4 calculates the same section this way: of 60 Lucan pericopes, 31 (52%) parallel Matthew/Q and 29 (48%) are uniquely Lucan. Resseguie argues that only one-tenth of the material in 9:51–18:14 has even a possible Marcan connection. Teaching material that is capable of being repeated might slightly alter the exact count. Nonetheless, the numbers of Huck-Lietzmann and Resseguie are closer to the real percentages, since Luke 9:51–18:14 lacks any significant Marcan parallels. In addition, most of the Q pericopes and unique Lucan material are long units. Conceptual overlap with Matthew and unique Lucan material abound (see the introduction in vol. 1, pp. 10–12). Goulder (1989: 455) notes that in 9:51–13:21 one of every three words comes from Q or L, while in 13:22–18:14 (where Goulder ends the unit) one in six words comes from this material.

9 Talbert 1982: 111–12 sees chiasmus in 9:51–19:44, but has to omit Luke 15 and place 14:1–6 out of its Lucan order! Goulder 1964: 196 argues for the following chiastic links:

10:25	eternal life
11:1	prayer
11:14	healing
11:37	pharisaic hypocrisy
12:1	money
12:35	repentance
13:10	rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts
14:1	rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts

15:1	repentance
16:1	money
16:14	pharisaic hypocrisy
17:11	healing
17:5	prayer
18:18	eternal life

The most plausible case for chiasmus is made by Farrell 1986. Blomberg also deals with and rejects theories that make the central section a Christian Deuteronomy; see C. F. Evans 1955. My main criticism of Blomberg's article is that it regards the section's end as falling at 18:34, ignoring later literary clues that Jesus has not arrived in Jerusalem (19:28, 41). This may be the Achilles' heel against his theory that the section's parable source was laid out chiastically, especially if 19:11–27 is taken into consideration. Still, aspects of Blomberg's case and the general outline of a possible Lucan source may surface in my discussion; see also Nolland 1993a: 530–31.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson 1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like “hand of God” (1:66) and “arm of God” (1:51).

3 For effective refutation, see O’Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O’Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the “lostness” of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

3 If one sees multiple versions of Q and recognizes how much teaching and parabolic material is in special Luke, then the possibility of overlaps with Matthean teaching (or Q) becomes very likely. The presence of a teaching in one strand of tradition does not mean it is banned elsewhere. Proverbial statements may exist in this tradition outside of Q because the Lucan tradition also would have preserved different settings. Of course, Matthean prioritists see Matthew’s influence instead of Q, but the issues of the shift in setting and variation of wording are problems for all approaches that see Luke using Gospel material or sources. Any theory of alternate Q can just as well be evidence of special Lucan material. The possibility of “alibi parallels” is real, but this means that we have conceptual parallels, rather than source parallels. For the view that Luke uses Matthew, see Goulder 1989: 639–43.

4 Soards 1987: 96 mentions 22:39a–b, 40b, 42 as the minimum (he excludes 22:43–44 on textual grounds). Ernst 1977: 607 and Goulder 1989: 741–42 make the best case for additional sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 329 rejects the originality of 22:43–44. For discussion of how the prayer's contents could be known when the disciples are some distance away and asleep, see R. Brown 1994: 174. The Jesus Seminar rejects the historicity of the material on the premise that no one heard the prayer (Funk and Hoover 1993: 391). Brown calls such an objection to historicity a "low level" approach and suggests that the disciples need not have been asleep at this point, although later he suggests that they did not need to hear the prayer because they knew how Jesus prayed. Either explanation is possible. Brown regards the prayer and the event as certain (p. 234), but is less confident of knowledge of the exact words (p. 225). I prefer the view that the event drove the meaning and form of the tradition.

33 On Jewish views of forgiveness of sin, see Nolland 1989: 236, who notes key studies: Sjö;berg 1938; Thyen 1970; Gradwohl 1974; and Klauck 1981.

21 Grässer 1960 contains a full treatment of this issue from this perspective. For a different, better approach to the same issue, see A. Moore 1966.

53 Laurentin 1957a: 176–88 (this discussion is only in the French edition). The view is first attested in Gregory of Nyssa in A.D.. 386; PG 46:1140D–41A; R. Brown 1977: 304; and Delling, TDNT 5:834–35, esp. n. 55, who prefers to speak of a "virgin conception" as the most accurate way to describe Luke's portrayal. Wiefel 1988: 53 refers to Ambrose, Expositio

Evangelii Secundam Lucam 2 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 32:99), and Augustine, De Sancta Virginitate 4 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 41:327). For the full history of exegesis, see Graystone 1968: 3–36.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

8 Soards 1987: 49 and J. Green 1988: 231–33 argue that Luke used traditional material to which John also had access.

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

4 J. Green 1988: 282 calls Luke the most primitive form of the tradition. Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–59 is agnostic on historicity, saying that it is impossible to prove. The most detailed English study, Catchpole 1971: 153–220, gives the nod to Luke. For a more skeptical appraisal, giving seven reasons not to accept these accounts as authentic, see E. Sanders 1985: 296–99. For a detailed response to most of his objections, see Bock 1994b. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 392–93) rejects Jesus' prediction (22:61) and the trial dialogue (22:67–69, 70) as inauthentic because 22:61 recalls 22:34 and the absence of disciples at the trial means that no witnesses were present. Jesus' anticipation of Peter's failure, however, reflects his knowledge of how pressure would cause Peter to wilt (the disciples' past record of inconsistency might also contribute to Jesus' expectation). The presence of people like Joseph of Arimathea at the trial makes an internal witness possible.

5 Carefully surveying the historical background to the trial scenes and crucifixion in a Jewish setting, O. Betz 1982 argues for the historical coherence and integrity of the Marcan account as well as for its chronological priority (against Catchpole and Green in n. 4 above). He suggests that the temple charge, which Luke lacks, raised the issue of Jesus' authority and, in the view of the Jews, made him a risk to begin a chain of events that ultimately would lead Rome to take the temple and Jerusalem (John 11:47–52). The messianic confession only highlighted the danger in their view. This could be called blasphemous in the sense that someone causing God's people to be handed over to the nations would be guilty of his name being blasphemed (11QTemple^{a} 64.6–13). Betz's study raises one potential element that could have set up the decisive Jewish negative reaction to Jesus (for another, more direct cause, see the exegesis of 22:69). I am not certain, however, that it is as important to choose between the Lucan and Marcan accounts as other scholars seem prone to believe. Gospel writers could incorporate older source materials despite the age of their composition.

4 Judaism also had hopes of priestly messianic figures; see 1QS 9.11 and Neusner, Green, and Frerichs 1987.

13 Greeven, TDNT 6:64–65, details this background and shows that the dove was the bird of the gods. Aphrodite was "the dove goddess" on many coins.

21 Greeven, TDNT 6:763–64 and n. 59, observes that the objects of such actions in the NT are God, his agents, or false gods. The agents always tell the supplicant to rise, and the bowing to false gods is always condemned (Acts 14:13–16; Isa. 41:5–7, 21–22).

14 One other Synoptic difference needs notation. Luke uses what some see as the narrower term for petition: δέησις. The distinction that δέησις = petition and προσευχή = prayer is not present in the NT, and the reference in 5:33 appears to be general. For the distinction, see Greeven, TDNT 2:807, though he acknowledges that it is harder to argue for the distinction in nouns.

29 On αἰτέω meaning much is "asked" ethically of someone, see Stählin, TDNT 1:191. In the financial realm, the term can indicate the "payment asked" by someone (on the similar use of ζητέω [to seek], see Greeven, TDNT 2:892 §1). A similar commercial term is παρατίθημι (to commit or deposit) (Maurer, TDNT 8:163). The verse emphasizes ethical responsibility and uses imagery that compares such responsibility to fiscal responsibility.

16 Marshall 1978: 65, who cites H. Gressmann through Klostermann 1929: 13, who in turn prefers חַדָּי. Greetings of peace are found in Luke 10:5; 24:36; John 20:19, 21, 26.

3 Among the candidates for comparison are Cyrus, Romulus and Remus, Mithras, Osiris, Aion, Virgil, Semiramis, and Moses. For discussions see Creed 1930: 30–32; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Bultmann 1963: 298; Gressmann 1914; and Machen 1930: 348–58 (who has a detailed critique). Virtually no one argues for any direct connection, though most speak of the account's legendary features, because of its supernatural elements.

27 Gressmann 1911 notes the nature of the customs. Perles's attempt (1919–20) to suggest an Aramaic element תבל (tbl) behind the tradition that should be translated "seasoning" instead of "soil" fails on lexical grounds. The תבל/γῆ interchange is found in Isa. 14:21; 26:9, 18; 1 Chron. 16:30; cf. 11QtgJob 24.8; 29.3 with Job 34:13; 37:12. Correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1069–70 and Black 1967: 166–67.

4 Farris 1985: 14 makes the latter two charges. Grigsby 1984 argues that the aorist tenses of the hymn are against its proposed Marian setting and give evidence that the hymn was inserted by Luke. The Magnificat, he believes, originally was a Semitic hymn that came to Luke in Greek through the Jewish-Christian church, but Grigsby's approach ignores the hymn's Semitic roots and setting, as well as making too much of the aorist tenses. See the exegesis of 1:51 and n. 22 below.

22 BDF §333; Hendriksen 1978: 108, 112 defends this sense and cites Robertson 1923: 836–37, though Robertson says "maybe" to this view. For Grigsby 1984: 167 n. 29, this force is impossible, and he notes that the BDF discussion of the gnomic aorist does not mention the Magnificat. He apparently failed to read the fine-print portion of §333.2, where the hymn is mentioned. His omission undercuts the key reason he offers for rejecting a pre-Christian setting for the hymn.

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24.

The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

4 Bultmann 1963: 299; Grundmann 1963: 76. Luke is given credit for 2:1–5 because of the note that alludes to history. Such notes are unique to his Gospel and recall the historical notes common in the OT historical books, esp. Kings and Chronicles.

16 Grundmann, TDNT 2:58. Schmitz, TDNT 5:798, argues that the phrase is Palestinian.

27 Farris 1985: 147 and Grundmann 1963: 90 argue that Simeon is the "first redeemed man," but Zechariah's hymn also reveals Jesus' role in salvation (1:69–78). What Simeon portrays is the one who can rest in Jesus.

20 Grundmann, TDNT 3:545, though he overemphasizes baptism here. The fruit is submission to God through repentance, which in turn is productive; also Behm, TDNT 4:1001. The presence of more than one tree argues against seeing trees as a corporate image equal to Israel, as Maurer, TDNT 6:988 §4a, holds. What John says about the day of judgment applies to any unproductive person, though it is clear that John's audience is a Jewish one.

30 Sloan 1977: 33–36. Grundmann, TDNT 2:59, sees a clear messianic allusion (Isa. 49:8–11; 58:6–8), though what the Isaiah texts show is the presence of decisive deliverance more than a direct allusion to Messiah. Ἐνιαυτός recalls not only Isa. 61:2, but also Lev. 25:10, which teaches Jubilee.

20 Grundmann, TDNT 2:301–2; Tannehill 1986: 83. On power: Luke 4:14; 5:17; 6:19; 8:46; Acts 10:38; on miracles: Luke 19:37; Acts 2:22; on authority: Luke 10:19.

33 Marshall 1978: 197; Ernst 1977: 182; Hendriksen 1978: 269–70. See the exegesis of 4:35a for fuller discussion. Other demonic confessions are Mark 1:24; 3:11; 5:7; Luke 4:34; 8:28; Acts 16:17; 19:15; Matt. 8:29; Friedrich, TDNT 3:708; Grundmann, TDNT 3:900 §B1.

11 Gen. 21:8; 26:30; Esth. 1:3; 1 Esdr. 3:1; see also Luke 14:13. Δοχή refers to a meal given with hospitality: "a banquet"; Grundmann, TDNT 2:54.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 696; SB 2:164; Wiefel 1988: 157–58. Grundmann 1963: 174 notes that women could not go into the synagogue or say the *Shema*ʿ. The late Tosepta text just cited gives the remark of a Jewish leader who rejoices that he is not a pagan, a woman, or unlearned. See also Leipoldt 1955: 69–114 and Witherington 1979.

12 On demons crying out to resist exorcism, see Grundmann, TDNT 3:900; O. Betz, TDNT 9:294.

8 On the term θεοῦ (of God) as tightly binding Jesus and God, see Stauffer, TDNT 3:104 n. 261; Mark 1:24; John 1:29; 6:33, 69; Luke 23:35; 2 Cor. 4:4. Grundmann, TDNT 9:532, calls it a genitive of authorship: Jesus is the Christ sent from God. The expression τὸν χριστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ is unique to Luke.

5 Luke 2:49; 4:43; 13:33; 17:25; 19:5; 22:37; 24:7, 26, 44. Grundmann, TDNT 2:23–24, notes that the term speaks of eschatological necessity, with roots in Dan. 2:28, 29 LXX; 2:45 Theodotion.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

8 BAGD 496; BAA 1006; Grundmann, TDNT 4:541–42. Μεγαλειότης is used in Acts 19:27 of Artemis; in 2 Pet. 1:16 of Christ; in Dan. 7:27 of the nations; and in 1 Esdr. 1:4 [1:5 NRSV] of Solomon. A related term is found in Luke 1:49.

7 The concept of reception pictures the open welcome to be given to others. On δέξηται (he receives), see Marshall 1978: 396; Grundmann, TDNT 2:51–52. The term refers to friendly reception or hospitality, which was seen as sacred in the ancient world and in Judaism. B. Šab. 127a says, "Hospitality to travelers is greater than the greeting of the Shekinah." Though hyperbolic, the saying shows the importance of hospitality.

Josephus, Jewish War 7.4.1 §63, refers to how Vespasian's reception brought joy and satisfaction.

19 Grundmann 1963: 209; Ernst 1977: 332; also 1 Enoch 89.14, 18–20, 55; 90.6–17; Sir. 13:17 ("how can wolf and lamb agree? / just so with sinner and devout" [NJB]); 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:18.

31 Here ὑμῖν is a good example of a dative of disadvantage: "against you." Marshall 1978: 423 and Grundmann 1963: 210 note that this is true—unless the town repents. The declaration is not decisive, but it indicates where the town is headed. The danger of refusal now is that there will be refusal later. For more on "shaking dust," see Cadbury 1933: 269–71.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

54 Such efforts, beginning with Harnack, regard this verse as too harsh a literary transition. This view appeals to the church fathers, who often cite the phrase and reverse the position of the Son and Father. Creed 1930: 147–48 rightly rejects such attempts because they are without strong external textual support; see also Schweizer, TDNT 8:372 n. 276. Marshall 1978: 435 notes that Marcion and codex N reverse the expression in Luke, while Justin Martyr and codex N reverse it in Matthew; for more reversal passages in the fathers, see Grundmann 1963: 218 n. 16.

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus’ intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark’s account and does not testify to a separate event.

36 A water snake is probably referred to by ὄφις, since this snake was used as bait for fishing; see Grundmann 1963: 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 915; Foerster, TDNT 5:566–68.

5 Creed 1930: 159 speaks of Q here, as does Manson 1949: 83. The amount of Matthean-Lucan agreement makes this source connection likely, though whether it is Q or another shared tradition is debatable (Matthean prioritists see Matthew as the likely source). Grundmann 1963: 236–37 correctly notes that Matthew is closer to Luke than to Mark (see also Easton 1913, as discussed in n. 1 above). Fitzmyer 1985: 918 argues for Lucan additions in 11:16, but is uncertain about it in 11:14, 21–22. Additional source material cannot be ruled out. Tiede 1988: 216 notes that Matt. 12:23 and Mark 3:11 stress Christology, while Luke emphasizes controversy with the leadership; but Luke also has strong Christology in light of the parable in 11:21–23. Of the three accounts, Mark has less confrontation than the other two.

18 Josephus ties the origin of Jewish exorcism to the days of Solomon; Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; 2.13.3 §286; Tob. 6:1–7; 8:1–3; 1QapGen 20.29; SB 4:533–35; Grundmann 1963: 238; Talbert 1982: 137.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ʾ*Abot* 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

9 Grundmann 1963: 242 argues that Jonah was seen as a sign in Judaism because of his miraculous deliverance from the whale; see SB 1:642–49. But these Jewish references are late, as Fitzmyer 1985: 935–36 notes, adding that Josephus's account of Jonah (Antiquities 9.10.2 §§208–14) makes nothing of the fish episode.

13 On Jesus as bearer of God's wisdom, see Luke 7:35; 10:21–22; 1 Cor. 1:24, 30. On the Son of Man as bringer of wisdom, see 1 Enoch 49.1–3; Grundmann 1963: 242.

15 At Qumran, the Spirit of truth is the light that illumines human hearts; 1QS 4.2; Grundmann 1963: 243. The OT image is found in Job 29:3; Ps. 112:4; Isa. 42:6–7; 45:7; 59:9–10; Mic. 7:8; Fitzmyer 1985: 940. The body is a metonymy of container for contents and refers to the person.

17 Manson 1949: 269 favors the suggestion. Grundmann 1963: 248 n. 8 argues the possibility for the original saying, but notes that it cannot be Luke's meaning. Fitzmyer 1985: 947 rejects the option.

31 Grundmann 1963: 250 suggests that γνώσεως (knowledge) is an objective genitive, thus "the key for knowledge." Another option, a genitive of apposition ("the key that is knowledge," by which is meant "obedient knowledge") is less likely. This latter reading would be an odd way to say "you have taken away knowledge," but so Jeremias, TDNT 3:747–48, who acknowledges that this image, though different from the other option, is similar.

1 Most argue for Q: Fitzmyer 1985: 953 (12:1 from L), 956 (12:2–9 from Q), 962–63 (12:10 from Q or Mark; 12:11–12 from Q); Ernst 1977: 392 (for 12:2–9); and Schneider 1977a: 277. Grundmann 1963: 252 says it is “probably” Q. Marshall 1978: 510 speaks of Q material conflated with Marcan elements and also argues that Q has various recensions and that Luke’s version is slightly different from that of Matthew. Nolland 1993a: 675–76 sees Q for 12:2–9 and a mixture of Q and Mark for 12:10–12.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‘a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to “acts of mercy”; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, “My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures.” The object of the last clause is not clear (“for heaven,” “of benefits,” “of souls,” or “for myself in the world to come”), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

10 Manson 1949: 114 regards the material as coming from distinct sources, as does Grundmann 1963: 262, though they differ as to which sources and give no reasons. Marshall 1978: 531 argues for the same source, but the distinct wording is a difficulty for that view. Fitzmyer 1985: 981 argues that 12:33a is Lucan and cites 11:41 for support, but that verse is figurative for one’s life and is not similar enough to argue that Luke created this saying. In addition, Fitzmyer argues that Luke abridged Matthew’s saying, but this cannot explain entirely the distinct terminology. Wiefel 1988: 241 sees Q and special L material here that Luke combined to answer the point made in 12:21.

11 Grundmann 1963: 263 notes the contrast of Jesus' position to the Stoics, who tried to live without possessions and who tried to have no need of other people, so they could be "like the gods"; Diogenes Laertius 6.104. Danker 1988: 253 notes that monastic withdrawal is not the answer either, since Jesus assumes compassionate engagement with people.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

10 Διορύσσω is used elsewhere at Matt. 6:19, 20; 24:43; BAGD 199; BAA 400; cf. Exod. 22:2 [22:1 MT]; Job 24:16; Jer. 2:34. The image of Jesus returning as a thief is common in the NT: 1 Thess. 5:2, 4; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3; 16:15; Grundmann 1963: 265; Plummer 1896: 331.

11 Grundmann, TDNT 2:706, says that the Bible uses ἕτοιμος to speak of three kinds of readiness: (1) ready to do good works (Titus 3:1); (2) ready to preach the gospel (1 Pet. 3:15); and (3) ready for the Lord's return (here and Matt. 24:44).

5 This form of mission statement appears at Qumran; Marshall 1978: 546. 1QH has numerous claims by the Teacher of Righteousness about what God is doing through him. Jeremias 1971a: 293 and n. 6 defends the age of the key tradition in Mark 10:45, another example where multiple traditions are possible with Luke 22:27. As a controversial figure, such statements of purpose from Jesus were inevitable (see Grundmann 1963: 269 for a critique of Bultmann).

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

1 Schweizer 1984: 225–26, though noting links to Matthew, suggests that the tradition may have come together before Luke, because of non-Lucan language in 13:25–27. Luce 1933: 240 sees too little correspondence to attribute the material to Q, as does Grundmann 1963: 284, who speaks of a special Lucan source. Michaelis, TDNT 5:71, argues for distinct traditions of the image of the open door.

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

35 Bultmann 1963: 175–76, 199–200; so also Grundmann 1963: 318–20, esp. 320, who also argues that Luke changes an original parabolic reference to the master to refer to Jesus. Luce 1933: 260 regards ὅτι (for) in 16:8b as difficult for any other view.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1136–37 argues that all of the material is from Q, but that 17:2 has been influenced by Mark 9:42. Marshall 1978: 640 agrees that Q and Mark overlap in 17:1–2 and also sees (pp. 642, 643–44) the rest of 17:3–6 as coming from Q, though he entertains the possibility that Q has various forms from which Matthew and Luke drew. Creed 1930: 215 sees Q and Mark 11:23 exercising influence in 17:5–6. Ernst 1977: 477–80 sees 17:1–3a as coming from either Q or a form of oral tradition that circulated in a variety of forms, 17:3b–4 as rooted in Jesus' teaching, and triple tradition (i.e., Mark and Q) influencing 17:5–6. Ellis 1974: 207 speaks of Mark and Q in 17:1–4 and regards Luke's special source as responsible for 17:5–10. Egelkraut 1976: 120–21 speaks of Q/Mark overlap in 17:1–2 and multiple tradition in 17:5–6. Grundmann 1963: 331 suggests that it is hard to know if Q or Luke's special material is responsible for the unit, except for 17:7–10, which is L. Grundmann sees its roots in material earlier than the versions of Matthew and Mark. All of this assumes that only one form of these sayings existed in the tradition and that it emerged from a single saying. If this was a theme repeated by Jesus, multiple renderings could well exist.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

3 Grundmann 1963: 345 sees a saying about persistence in prayer appended to a parable like 11:5–13; esp. B. Scott 1989: 177–78. The Jesus Seminar argues that the themes of prayer and the returning Son of Man are Lucan. But a connection to the parable sources shows that prayer has traditional roots and the concept of the "elect" is only in Luke here. It is not a Lucan expression.

6 Ἐγκακέω almost has the force "do not give up faith." The term can mean "to become weary" (2 Thess. 3:13; Gal. 6:9) or the more eschatological "to lose heart" (2 Cor. 4:1, 16; Eph. 3:13); BAGD 215; BAA 434; Grundmann, TDNT 3:486. Symmachus uses the verb in Gen. 27:46; Num. 21:5; Prov. 3:11; Isa. 7:16 (Delling 1962: 6 n. 23).

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

23 Not accepting that the parable deals with final judgment, Fitzmyer 1985: 1238 and Grundmann 1963: 365 argue that it refers instead to Jerusalem's destruction. This contradicts 19:11, which states that the parable deals explicitly with the consummated kingdom's coming and judgment at that time. Nonetheless, the observation is helpful, because Jerusalem's judgment (19:41–44; 21:5–38) pictures a greater judgment to come. Though not in this parable, that judgment pictures for Luke what the final judgment is like.

15 Grundmann 1963: 376 argues that the question's force is "why does one say. . . ?" But this could be taken erroneously as a denial of Davidic sonship, a view that goes back to D. F. Strauss (see Plummer 1896: 473). The interrogative πῶς is better understood to press for "in what manner?"

4 Ὥρα (hour) occurs many times in the passion narrative, including Mark 14:35, 41; John 12:23; 13:1; 17:1; Luke 22:53. Because ὥρα carries no qualifiers (as in 22:53), it conveys no special sense of God's hour (against Grundmann 1963: 392 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1384; as noted by Marshall 1978: 794 and especially Soards 1987: 33).

6 While recognizing that the two accounts share some similarities, V. Taylor 1972: 61–64; Schürmann 1957: 63–99; Marshall 1978: 811; and Grundmann 1963: 400 note that Luke does not delay Marcan texts like this elsewhere.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown

1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

6 On the syntax of ἤρξαντο (they began), which Luke often uses to speak of a fresh reaction, see 4:21; 5:21; 7:15; 12:45; 13:25; 19:37; Plummer 1896: 520; Grundmann 1963: 422. Κατηγορέω (to accuse) is used elsewhere by Luke at Luke 6:7; 23:10, 14; Acts 22:30; 24:2, 8, 13, 19; 25:5, 11, 16; 28:19; Büchsel, TDNT 3:637.

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

6 On Guelich's view of Matthew's and the sources' postsermon work to expand the Beatitudes in light of the Psalms and Isa. 61, see pp. 115–18.

26 Koch 1969: 7; Hauck, TDNT 4:368 (who suggests this distinction); Fitzmyer 1981: 632–33; Klostermann 1929: 78–79. Guelich 1982: 63–65, 109–11 discusses the options in detail and rejects the absolute distinction.

27 "Blessed is/are the one(s) who … because (ὅτι).… " Guelich 1982: 63 and Fitzmyer 1981: 632–33 discuss the form of beatitudes.

37 1QS 1.10; 2.4–9; 9.21–23; Ellis 1974: 114; Guelich 1982: 226. The leaning of the imprecatory Psalms in this direction is what makes their tone so difficult. Because Jesus' ethic is a heightening of old standards, they appear in antithesis in Matthew. It is right to call for God's justice, but it is also important to seek the best for fellow humans. God's justice is in place and will occur, as the eschatological remarks of the sermon make clear. But the disciple seeks the enemies' transformation and hopes that they may come to know God so that they can enter into God's grace and kindness, while escaping his wrath.

43 Guelich 1982: 360 notes that the saying fits in both settings, while not explicitly advocating a repetition.

68 Guelich 1982: 412, 404; Marshall 1978: 275; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:603. For βροχή (only in Matt. 7:25, 27 in the NT), see BAGD 147 and BAA 294.

16 The distinction is one that goes back to Aquinas (Summa part 2.1, question 108, article 4), who argues for a difference between command (praeceptum) and counsel (consilium). A command is binding, advice is not —except on those who pursue a special kind of holiness like the monastics. The result is a distinction in Catholic ethics between that which is necessary for gaining eternal bliss and that which aids to that end. See the discussions in Guelich 1982: 15 and Strecker 1988: 15–16.

4 Guenther 1985: 31. Nolland 1989: 265–68 has a full discussion, though he sees too much distance between Paul's and Luke's views when he argues that Luke limits the term ἀπόστολος to the Twelve. One of the ways that Luke indicates respect for Paul is by calling him an apostle in Acts 14:4, 14 and by showing that Paul does everything that Peter did as an apostle. Nolland decides that the Lucan use reflects a later title. The use of the phrase the Twelve as a fixed technical term in the earliest Christian material—even when the Twelve are not present (1 Cor. 15:5)—also speaks for the authenticity of ἀπόστολος here.

41 Gundry 1982: 138 notes that Matthew will mention exorcisms later. Carson 1984: 204 argues that Matthew omits the account to condense the presentation of Jesus' authority. The omission is still odd, because the passage fits Matthew's theme.

28 Tg. Lam. 2:20 reads, "Zechariah son of Iddo, the high priest"; Gundry 1967: 86 n. 1. The Chronicles priest likely functioned as a prophet in 2 Chron. 24:19–22, but his priestly function was paramount in his identification as the son of a great priest. It should be noted that within three verses we have two potential points of contact with Tg. Lam. 2:20, though this second contact is not certain (see the exegesis of 11:49).

8 There can be no rabbinic-style distinction between legal duty and voluntary acts of love after Jesus expounds these texts; correctly, Gutbrod,

TDNT 4:1064.

7 Guthrie 1970 deals with these issues from a conservative, evangelical viewpoint, while the introduction of Kümmel 1975 serves as a good survey of common critical approaches to these issues. See the introduction on "Sources" for these issues as they relate to Luke. Orchard and Riley 1987 detail the ancient testimony of the church on this question.

46 The English translations by H. T. Andrews (in Charles 1913: 2.113) and Hadas 1951: 180–81 correctly look like the Golden Rule, while that by R. J. H. Shutt (in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 2.26) does not.

22 Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218; Haenchen 1961.

7 Among the hypotheses are the following:

	Added to	Adherents
1:76–79	Jewish or Jewish-Christian hymn	Winter 1956: 239 n. 41
1:76 or 1:76–77	early Christian hymn	Benoit 1956–57: 182–91
1:68–75	Christian hymn	Schürmann 1969: 88–90
1:76–77, 79b	Baptist hymn	Hahn 1969: 242–43, 365–66

1:76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn of the Anawim	R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Farris 1985: 27–28
1:70, 76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn probably from the Anawim	Fitzmyer 1981: 378

9 Marshall 1978: 285 notes that Luke 19:34; 22:61; and 24:3 are not exceptions to this observation, though he also notes that the final decision is still open; Creed 1930: 104. Hahn 1969: 81–82 argues that Luke, though introducing the title himself, reflects traditional usage.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson 1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like "hand of God" (1:66) and "arm of God" (1:51).

4 For the options on how to take this act in light of the Synoptics and John's Gospel, see Witherington 1990: 113–15, who appeals to John 2:16; Zech. 14:21; and Neh. 13:4–9, 12–13 to see both a prophetic and messianic (but not revolutionary) cleansing. He argues that it was the act of an individual and was seen as symbolic of a need for national repentance, not the rejection of the nation. Witherington also argues that Jesus does not have a Davidic expectation (like that expressed in Ps. Sol. 17). True, Jesus does not yet function like the warrior in the Psalms of Solomon, but he will, as his remarks at his trial show. This is one reason why, when some speak of the Christ, Jesus replies in terms of the judging Son of Man, just as he did at his trial. For the cleansing as messianic act, see Hamilton 1964.

8 On the debate about 19:8, see Mitchell 1990, who argues for the view that Zacchaeus is defending his past behavior. On the other side, Hamm 1981 makes the case for repentance and conversion.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

19 Does κατένευσαν refer to signaling with their heads or voices because their hands are busy, as Nolland 1989: 222 suggests? Cf. the use of signals in 1:62. Μέτοχος appears only here in the Gospels; Hanse, TDNT 2:831.

50 BAGD 422 §1bβ; BAA 860 §1bβ. Key theological parallels are 1 Cor. 11:2; 15:2; 1 Thess. 5:21; Heb. 3:6, 14; 10:23; Hanse, TDNT 2:829.

3 For a discussion of the linguistic force of ἔχων δαιμόνια (having demons), see Hanse, TDNT 2:821–22.

33 Ἐνέχω is a difficult term to translate (BAGD 265; BAA 536; Mark 6:19): "to press against someone," "to hold a grudge," or "to have it in for someone.” With δεινῶς (terribly), the idea is “to be very hostile” to someone (BAGD 173; BAA 346; Matt. 8:6). Hanse, TDNT 2:828, argues for “to press against him,” where the idea is that of being surrounded by hostile opponents.

16 The use of εἰ (if) plus ἄν (untranslated particle) yields a mixed condition; Arndt 1956: 369; BDF §372.1a. On the idiom πίστιν ἔχειν (to have faith), see 4 Macc. 16:22; Matt. 17:20; 21:21 = Mark 11:22; Acts 14:9; Rom. 14:2 (conceptually); 1 Cor. 13:2; 1 Tim. 1:19; 3:9; Philem. 5; James 2:1, 14, 18; Hanse, TDNT 2:826 n. 58.

1 Bovon 1989: 357–58 notes the OT similarities (returning the son to the parent, the widow, and recognition that God’s messenger is present) and differences (Jesus’ taking the initiative, instantaneous resuscitation, and the crowd’s response). Bovon references the key study of this passage by Harbarth 1978. For the connections to 1 Kings, see Brodie 1986, though he overdraws the case for framing around this OT book. The differences between the OT and the event reveal that the event controls the details (see C. A. Evans 1990: 115 and Evans in Evans and Sanders 1993: 223–24).

16 On ἁπλοῦς as “clear, pure, healthy,” see BAGD 86 and BAA 171. When the eye is clear, it is healthy and takes in light. The eye is a figure for spiritual condition in Matt. 6:22; Prov. 4:18–19; 11:25 (ἁπλοῦς with a different sense); T. Iss. 3.4; 4.6; Bauernfeind, TDNT 1:386; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377; Harder, TDNT 6:556; SB 1:302, 431–32, 722, 833.

7 For example, Luce 1933: 317 favors the Maccabean date. Leaney 1958: 254–55 discusses it, but his position is less clear, though he does cite

1 Macc. 14:41 as conceptually parallel (i.e., its reference to the “governor and high priest forever”). See also Hardy 1945.

8 But so argues Creed 1930: 22–23, who draws on the position of Harnack. Also in favor of this view are Danker 1988: 41; Klostermann 1929: 17–18; Bultmann 1963: 296–97; and Luce 1933: 91–92.

1 Farris 1985: 30 notes that A. Harnack admitted this stylistic feature in the Nunc Dimittis. There are some, however, who hold out for Lucan redaction, merely because of the Gentile emphasis.

54 Such efforts, beginning with Harnack, regard this verse as too harsh a literary transition. This view appeals to the church fathers, who often cite the phrase and reverse the position of the Son and Father. Creed 1930: 147–48 rightly rejects such attempts because they are without strong external textual support; see also Schweizer, TDNT 8:372 n. 276. Marshall 1978: 435 notes that Marcion and codex N reverse the expression in Luke, while Justin Martyr and codex N reverse it in Matthew; for more reversal passages in the fathers, see Grundmann 1963: 218 n. 16.

16 BAGD 471 (with bibliography); BAA 957; Van Der Loos 1965: 465–68; Michaelis, TDNT 4:233–34; Harrison, NIDNTT 2:463–66; SB 4:745–63; Pousma 1975: 138–39. Λέπρα occurs in the NT only in Matt. 8:3 = Mark 1:42 = Luke 5:12–13. A related term, λεπρός, appears in Luke 4:27; 7:22; 17:12; Matt. 8:2; 10:8; 11:5; 26:6; Mark 1:40; 14:3.

9 For an Augustan denarius (about the size of a dime and weighing 3.8 grams), see Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible 1:909. For a Tiberian denarius, see photographs 44–45 in the same work (between pp.

896 and 897), and Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible 1:824. For a full discussion, see Hart 1984.

11 Jacobean and Petrine similarities to the sermon, both grammatical and conceptual, are as follows (for the Jacobean parallels, see Hartin 1991: 140–72):

James 1:2–4 ~ Luke 6:23

James 1:5 ~ Matt. 7:7

James 1:9–11 ~ Luke 6:24

James 1:17 ~ Matt. 7:11

James 2:5 ~ Luke 6:20

James 2:6–7 ~ Luke 6:24

James 2:7 ~ Luke 6:22

James 3:9 ~ Luke 6:28

James 3:11–12 ~ Luke 6:43

James 3:12 ~ Matt. 7:16

James 3:18 ~ Matt. 5:9

James 4:9 ~ Luke 6:25

James 4:11 ~ Matt. 7:1–5

James 5:1 ~ Luke 6:24

James 5:2 ~ Matt. 6:19

James 5:5 ~ Luke 6:25

James 5:11 ~ Luke 6:36 and Matt. 5:12

James 5:12 ~ Matt. 5:34–37

1 Peter 3:9 ~ Matt. 5:44 = Luke 6:28

1 Peter 3:14 ~ Matt. 5:10 = Luke 6:22–23

1 Peter 3:16 ~ Luke 6:28

1 Peter 4:14 ~ Luke 6:22

1 Peter 5:7 ~ Matt. 6:25

26 Through tracing the saying's later tradition history, Harvey 1982b: 211 n. 8 argues that its original context is not certain, but the Matthean and Lucan settings are a natural starting point. There is good cultural precedent in the Essene and other communities for such hospitable reception for traveling religious messengers. Rabbis were forbidden to receive direct wages for their teaching, though such provision was allowed; m. ›Abot 1.13; 4.5; Daube 1956: 395–96.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

29 Danker 1988: 48–49; Plummer 1896: 42; Hauck, TDNT 5:491 n. 24, 493. The combination is found elsewhere in Wis. 9:3 and Eph. 4:24. God seeks righteousness and worship even among the heathen: Acts 13:10, 16; 24:25; 10:35, 43; Schrenk, TDNT 2:199. In the OT, Josh. 24:14 is similar in thrust; Nolland 1989: 88.

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 ("spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming"); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279. In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

18 Such metaphors are often called “similitudes”; Hauck, TDNT 5:753; Marshall 1978: 226.

26 Koch 1969: 7; Hauck, TDNT 4:368 (who suggests this distinction); Fitzmyer 1981: 632–33; Klostermann 1929: 78–79. Guelich 1982: 63–65, 109–11 discusses the options in detail and rejects the absolute distinction.

15 Parables in Luke 10:36 and Matt. 21:31 also end with questions; Hauck, TDNT 5:754.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta

Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

27 Jesus' allusion to the beginning of the world (Foerster, TDNT 3:1029; Hauck, TDNT 3:620; Matt. 13:35; Heb. 4:3; 9:26) makes the expression a merism: "the whole line of prophets."

6 Jesus' introduction of the parable compares with rabbinic introductions of similar material; SB 2:7–9; note also Isa. 40:18; Marshall 1978: 561; Hauck, TDNT 5:753–54.

7 Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον means "that which falls to me"; Tob. 3:17; 6:12; P. Oxy. vol. 4 #715 lines 13–15; Creed 1930: 198; Hauck, TDNT 1:529; MM 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 1087. As a noun, οὐσίας refers to property; Tob. 14:13; 3 Macc. 3:28; Josephus, Antiquities 7.5.5 §114. On διεῖλεν (he divided), see Schlier, TDNT 1:184.

8 Bultmann 1963: 178 calls the account a similitude, which is where he puts parables and such. Berger 1984: 51 sees it as a parable. Ernst 1977: 472 rightly compares it to 15:11–32 and 16:1–8. Hauck, TDNT 5:752, calls it an illustrative story and compares it to 10:30–37; 12:16–21; and 18:9–14. For the structure, see B. Scott 1989: 146–48.

6 Hayles 1973: 120; Fitzmyer 1981: 400. On Augustan census activity, see Braunert 1957; Corbishley 1936; Tacitus, Annals 1.11; Dio Cassius 53.30.2.

7 For example, Egypt was on a fourteen-year cycle, which seems to go back to 10–9 B.C..; Hayles 1973: 127.

8 These censuses include the entire first century after Christ; Hayles 1973: 128–29. Hayles's article gives numerous primary references.

13 Hoehner 1977: 16–17 cites Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.4 §319 and Jewish War 2.6.3 §96. Hayles 1974: 25–26 posits deteriorating relations between Augustus and Herod as an explanation for the census. The statement by Sherwin-White 1963: 163 n. 4 that such a census in this period is impossible is clearly excessive in light of our partial knowledge of this period.

14 Hayles 1974: 27–28 notes that Josephus does not call the census an innovation and that what was new was the administrative set-up introduced in Judea in A.D.. 6. He also notes how Josephus omits the mention of other known censuses, even in his discussion of contemporary history in the Jewish War. Josephus, Antiquities 18.1.1 §§3–4 speaks of taxation as the problem, but only as an indication of Israel's absence of liberty.

19 It is unfortunate that in both his detailed study (1977: 545–56) and his recent revision (1993), R. Brown, while rejecting Luke's approach, fails to refer to Hoehner or Hayles.

33 BAGD 602; BAA 1217–18; 1 Cor. 9:7; 1 Macc. 3:28; Heidland, TDNT 5:591; Caragounis 1974.

7 Godet 1875: 1.100–101 may overstate the case, but his point about the exposure of the populace to the Psalter is well taken; Hendriksen 1978: 101.

22 BDF §333; Hendriksen 1978: 108, 112 defends this sense and cites Robertson 1923: 836–37, though Robertson says "maybe" to this view. For Grigsby 1984: 167 n. 29, this force is impossible, and he notes that the BDF discussion of the gnomic aorist does not mention the Magnificat. He apparently failed to read the fine-print portion of §333.2, where the hymn is mentioned. His omission undercuts the key reason he offers for rejecting a pre-Christian setting for the hymn.

20 Hendriksen 1978: 125 includes a chart of various texts about Messiah. For covenant references in the OT, see Exod. 2:24; Lev. 26:42; Ps. 106:45; Ezek. 16:60; Bovon 1989: 106 n. 62.

34 Schürmann 1969: 91 n. 67; Hendriksen 1978: 131; Wiefel 1988: 65; BDF §400.6. Bovon 1989: 108 correctly states that John has a foot in each era, since as the last of the prophets of promise he sets the table for the new era (Luke 7:26; 16:16).

23 Hendriksen 1978: 144–45. On the ancient house, though inns are not explicitly discussed, see Safrai 1976a: 728–35.

25 Hendriksen 1978: 141; Godet 1875: 1.129; Plummer 1896: 52. Schrenk, TDNT 5:1016–17, esp. n. 7, argues similarly. The term οἶκος refers to the whole house of a ruler, while πατριά is added, so that the reference to the whole house is clearly seen as a specific reference to ancestry.

30 R. Brown 1977: 461; Hendriksen 1978: 170; Danker 1988: 68. Jeremias in his later TDNT article, 6:541–42, revised his view.

33 John 19:25–27; Godet 1875: 1.141; Hendriksen 1978: 170–71; Marshall 1978: 123. Nolland 1989: 122 cites Ps. 22:20 [22:21 MT]; 37:15; Zech. 12:10; 13:7; and Ps. 37:15 as conceptual background.

35 Hendriksen 1978: 172–73; Schneider 1977a: 72. The omission of the term ἕως in D and the Itala shows some ancient manuscripts had this view too. But the omission is not attested widely enough to be taken seriously as original.

19 Hendriksen 1978: 218 (who alludes to eternal generation); Geldenhuys 1951: 147; Marshall 1978: 155–56 (who more cautiously speaks only of a more than Messiah perspective, while refusing to emphasize ontology as such).

6 For defense of a Marian genealogy, see Hendriksen 1978: 222–25. Marshall 1978: 162 gives the grammatical refutation of the notion that the reference to Joseph is parenthetical, which would make the genealogy Mary's.

5 Hendriksen 1978: 230 has a full discussion. He tends to emphasize a perceived priestly theme in Luke, but this is the point of the writer to the Hebrews and not a part of Lucan Christology at all (see Schweizer 1984: 81–82).

20 On δόξα, see BAGD 204 §2; BAA 410 §2; Schweizer 1984: 83; and Hendriksen 1978: 235–36 (who cites 2 Chron. 9:9–28; Eccles. 2:1–11; Rev. 18:12–13). Kittel, TDNT 2:237, suggests translating the term "radiance." The term alludes to the splendor and value of these kingdoms.

33 Marshall 1978: 197; Ernst 1977: 182; Hendriksen 1978: 269–70. See the exegesis of 4:35a for fuller discussion. Other demonic confessions are Mark 1:24; 3:11; 5:7; Luke 4:34; 8:28; Acts 16:17; 19:15; Matt. 8:29; Friedrich, TDNT 3:708; Grundmann, TDNT 3:900 §B1.

4 So also Hendriksen 1978: 289; for a set of parallel units where Matthew seems more chronological, see the introduction to 5:27–32.

20 Hendriksen 1978: 291. Fitzmyer 1981: 575 notes a Qumran text on this topic: 11QTemple^{a} 48.17–49.4. At Qumran, lepers were also isolated to prevent additional defiling.

16 For this view are Schürmann 1969: 296; Hendriksen 1978: 309; Wiefel 1988: 121 (perhaps). Against it is Marshall 1978: 226. Bovon 1989: 261 thinks that any specific allusion to the cross or ascension is unlikely and prefers to refer only to the period of the church. The key terms are ἀπαρθῇ in Luke and two forms of αἴρω in Isa. 53.

14 Hendriksen 1978: 334 argues for this locale; Marshall 1978: 241–42 calls it possible. Davies and Allison 1988: 422 mention Karn Hattin (Horns of Hattin) as another suggestion, but they prefer not to adopt a specific location, since for them the Matthean sermon is a collected representative sermon, as opposed to a sermon in a single place (see excursus 7 for details). Edersheim 1889: 1.524 argues against Karn Hattin.

60 Hendriksen 1978: 362. Schürmann 1969: 372 notes that the second-person speech is against an original reference to the Pharisees, since they are rebuked in this way only in Luke 14:7–11. In addition, the term ὑποκριτής is not always used of Pharisees, as Matt. 24:51 and Luke 12:56 show. He sees the address as to the disciples, but not limited to them.

12 For a figurative force are Fitzmyer 1981: 671, 673–74; Hendriksen 1978: 395–96; Arndt 1956: 212; Marshall 1978: 294; Ernst 1977: 250; Schürmann 1969: 416 n. 53 (who mentions that such a reed, Phragmites communis, could grow to a height of sixteen feet).

26 Arndt 1956: 243 argues that their consciences feared more distress from God’s presence. Hendriksen 1978: 449 calls such fear sinful, because they showed no interest in the exorcised man. Danker 1988: 183 notes that a reference to possessions is unstated in Luke.

30 Hendriksen 1978: 450 speaks more carefully of the man's awareness of the "close relation" between Jesus and God.

22 Hendriksen 1978: 459 says that it was improper for a woman to speak publicly like this, but this is probably too strong. However, such speaking was rare (cf. 2:38). Jesus' question all but required that she speak.

33 Plummer 1896: 235; Marshall 1978: 344; Fitzmyer 1981: 746; Bovon 1989: 445–46 (who argues that Luke may be responsible for it); Creed 1930: 123; and Hendriksen 1978: 466 appear undecided. Arndt 1956: 246 and A. B. Bruce 1897: 525 are for inclusion. Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 137; Ellis 1974: 130; and Luce 1933: 173 omit it.

3 Hendriksen 1978: 198 n. 166. In relation to the accuracy of Tertullian, who in Against Marcion 1.15 argued that Jesus appeared in the twelfth year of Tiberius (ca. A.D.. 26–27), Eusebius in Chronicon 2 notes that Jesus suffered in the nineteenth year of Tiberius (A.D.. 33), so that the church fathers do not agree on the dates of Jesus' ministry either, since Jesus did not minister for seven years. Jesus' appearing is probably a reference to his baptism by John.

17 On the term ἐκβάλλω (to thrust out), see BAGD 237 §2 and BAA 478 §2. Against Hendriksen 1978: 572, the term does not mean "force out" here. It is, however, a strong, graphic term that shows that God calls and equips; so Arndt 1956: 281.

43 The latter idea is explicit in the textually uncertain Mark 16:18; Hendriksen 1978: 581.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 (“leans” this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

30 On the syntactical debate of 11:5–7, see Hendriksen 1978: 610. The basic issue is this: does Jesus' question end with 11:6 or 11:7? That Jesus' answer starts with 11:8 speaks in favor of the question extending through 11:7.

36 Plummer 1896: 303 and Hendriksen 1978: 622 cite Matt. 9:36; Isa. 40:11; and John 10:16 in support of a figure about sheep. To these could be added Ezek. 34 (where God is the Great Shepherd) and Zech. 13:7–9 (with its image of scattered sheep).

8 Plummer 1896: 306 argues that resurrection is implied at the end of the verse by the giving of a sign, but the Lucan context alone does not make such a reference clear. Hendriksen 1978: 627 and Arndt 1956: 302 make resurrection the only point, though Arndt admits that only Matthew makes this connection clear.

10 Hendriksen's remark (1978: 730) about taking the wife along is unlikely for the first century. An insult is likely, because the man had accepted the original invitation without mentioning his marriage and now he refuses to attend.

1 Hendriksen argues that seeing the passage as disconnected goes against the declaration of an orderly account in 1:3. This view interprets Luke's remark too narrowly. For Hendriksen, the connection is that disciples are not to commit the sin of harming others, which Jesus warned against in Luke 16. However, this connection ties only the first part to the previous unit and does not relate the pieces of this unit to each other.

24 Rejecting a medical term are Fitzmyer 1981: 550 and Cadbury 1926: 194–95, 203; but see also Hengel and Hengel 1959: 340–41. Cadbury shows that the terminology itself is not limited to physicians, but is quoted by laypeople, e.g., Aulus Cornelius Celsus and Alexander of Aphrodisias, the second of whom cites Galen almost verbatim (the source of both citations appears to be Archigenes). Thus, this language had come into popular use.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

14 So Schürmann 1969: 447 n. 29. Hengel 1963 argues that these women became important witnesses in the church, as their involvement in the resurrection accounts makes clear.

5 On Jewish "works of love" and for the key ancient texts, see Egelkraut 1976: 139 nn. 3, 5; SB 1:487–88; 4:578–92; Hengel 1981: 8–10 and n. 21.

Quick burials are mentioned in Acts 5:5–6, 10; John 11:1, 14, 17. On Jewish burial customs, see the exegesis of Luke 7:12. The OT notes periods that might demand that burial not take place, e.g., the time of exile (Jer. 16:5–7; Ernst 1977: 321).

5 On crucifixion and the activity associated with it, see Hengel 1977. The Roman practice of scourging (verberatio) preceded the execution of capital criminals, who were lashed until blood was drawn; Plautus, Bacchides 823; Suetonius, Claudius 34; and Suetonius, Domitian 11.

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been "abandoned" by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

24 Rejecting a medical term are Fitzmyer 1981: 550 and Cadbury 1926: 194–95, 203; but see also Hengel and Hengel 1959: 340–41. Cadbury shows that the terminology itself is not limited to physicians, but is quoted by laypeople, e.g., Aulus Cornelius Celsus and Alexander of Aphrodisias, the second of whom cites Galen almost verbatim (the source of both citations appears to be Archigenes). Thus, this language had come into popular use.

11 The view goes back to E. W. Hengstenberg; Godet 1875: 1.306.

6 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327, speaks of ἁμαρτωλοί as murderers, robbers, deceivers, and those of dishonorable vocation, which would include tax collectors; also Herrenbrück 1981.

24 Luke does not cite the text explicitly, but summarizes. This is not a softening of the reference, but his typical effort to shorten and summarize. For studies on the use and interpretation of Isa. 6:9–10 in Judaism and the early church, see Hesse 1955; Gnilka 1961; C. A. Evans 1989c.

25 For an excellent discussion of the history of interpretation of these passages, see Heth and Wenham 1984. For the debate, see House 1990.

27 For a defense of this position, see Murray 1953 and Hoehner 1987. For a defense of these grounds for divorce, but with no right to remarry, see Heth and Wenham 1984. Against a no-divorce-no-remarriage position stands Paul's reading of Jesus' command in 1 Cor. 7:12–16, which allows for divorce in the case of an unbeliever's desertion. Surely if Jesus' remarks were to be taken in the most strict sense, Paul would not have allowed this possibility, since an absolute view of a text such as Luke 16:18 apparently would have prohibited this option.

23 Jeremias 1969: 122–23 argues for twenty-four days, while Heutger 1983: 98 prefers fourteen. But Heutger does not consider the "poor man's" rate, speaking rather of a pensioner's rate of a denarius a week.

16 On Matthew, see Hill 1972: 200–201. Perrin 1963: 172–74 does not discuss Luke 16:16b because, in his view, it is a later addition to the tradition, a view that grows out of his identifying the two texts as the same tradition. Marshall 1978: 630 argues almost single-handedly for a positive sense in Matthew: “Men of violence seize at the opportunity of entering the kingdom.” This is not likely.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB 1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

4 The Egyptian account is dated before 331 b.c. by Jeremias 1963a: 183 n. 47 (the earliest manuscript is from a.d. 100), but Hock 1987: 452 shows that the Egyptian folk tale is not the likely background, since Luke lacks key elements of it. Hock’s appeal, however, to Micyllus in Lucian of Samosata’s Gallus and Cataplus likewise errs. These parallels merely show that the theme is a general one in the ancient culture. Hock calls the parable’s criterion of judgment unique, but it is not. The standards of care for the needy come from the Torah and should be followed, a common theme for Jesus.

11 Hoehner 1977: 14–15; K. Weiss, TDNT 9:81 n. 12. For the force of ἀπογράφεσθαι as a middle verb, “to register oneself,” see BDF §317; in favor of the middle voice are 2:3, 5.

13 BAGD 303; BAA 615; LSJ 669; Josephus, Jewish War 1.24.6 §487; Antiquities 18.6.6 §194; SB 2:164; Marshall 1978: 317; Fitzmyer 1981: 698; Hoehner 1972: 120, 303–5, 317 n. 4.

3 Both Klostermann 1929: 32–33 and Hoehner 1977: 14 use Schürer as a starting point.

5 Hoehner 1977: 14–27 defends December 5 B.C.. or January 4 B.C.. as the most likely date of Jesus’ birth. Another key chronological element is the mention that Jesus was about thirty years old at the start of his ministry (3:23), which is near the fifteenth year of Tiberius’s reign (3:1), around A.D.. 27 to 29. This last date yields the period from 10 B.C.. to 1 B.C.. for Jesus’ birth, with the thirty-year mark falling around 5–3 B.C.. For Tiberius’s date and the date of Jesus’ ministry, see the exegesis of 3:1.

10 Hoehner 1977: 15. Hoehner also cites (n. 20) a reference from Ulpian in The Digest of Justinian 1.15.4.2 that required property owners to go to the district where they owned land. Issues of ancestry and land may fit here, even though Joseph lived elsewhere.

12 Hoehner 1977: 16 cites examples in Syria, Cappadocia, and Nabatea. Tacitus, Annals 2.42 and 6.41, discusses Cappadocia, where taxes were reduced by about half.

13 Hoehner 1977: 16–17 cites Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.4 §319 and Jewish War 2.6.3 §96. Hayles 1974: 25–26 posits deteriorating relations between Augustus and Herod as an explanation for the census. The statement by Sherwin-White 1963: 163 n. 4 that such a census in this period is impossible is clearly excessive in light of our partial knowledge of this period.

17 This view dates back to the seventeenth century and is supported by F. F. Bruce 1972: 32 n. 1. Hoehner 1977: 21 discusses it.

18 This is the view that Hoehner 1977: 21–22 adopts, while Godet 1875: 1.124 calls it unlikely for Luke.

19 It is unfortunate that in both his detailed study (1977: 545–56) and his recent revision (1993), R. Brown, while rejecting Luke's approach, fails to refer to Hoehner or Hayles.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

4 On the possibility that Luke is from Antioch of Syria, a tradition that Jerome mentions in the prologue of his commentary on Matthew, see Hoehner 1972: 231–32 n. 9; Strobel 1958a; and the introduction to the Gospel of Luke abve, under "Origin and Purpose—Authorship—External Evidence." Schneider 1977a: 83 and Hoehner 1977: 34 do not agree on the month in view in 27: Schneider has Oct. 1 and Hoehner has Sept. 21.

5 Rist 1978. J. Wenham 1992b: 223 dates Matthew in 42, Mark in 45, and Luke in 55 at the latest—dates that are much earlier than typically assigned to the Gospels. Most conservatives place the Synoptics in the sixties, while most others have dates ranging from 60 to 90.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 455. Ernst 1977: 137, considering the various options, speaks of fall 27 to fall 29. Hoehner allows this as one of the two possible options.

27 For a defense of this position, see Murray 1953 and Hoehner 1987. For a defense of these grounds for divorce, but with no right to remarry, see Heth and Wenham 1984. Against a no-divorce-no-remarriage position stands Paul's reading of Jesus' command in 1 Cor. 7:12–16, which allows for divorce in the case of an unbeliever's desertion. Surely if Jesus' remarks were to be taken in the most strict sense, Paul would not have allowed this possibility, since an absolute view of a text such as Luke 16:18 apparently would have prohibited this option.

2 Jeremias 1966: 15–84 deals with various aspects of this issue. Other key studies include Hoehner 1977: 74–90; Marshall 1980: 30–75 (which has the advantage of assessing Jeremias's claims); Jaubert 1965; Blinzler 1958; and R. Brown 1962b. For bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1035–40.

9 Ἀγωνίζομαι suggests intense effort or straining labor; BAGD 15; BAA 27. With the present tense it contextually denotes continual striving. This is the only use of the word in the Synoptics; elsewhere at John 18:36; 1 Cor. 9:25; Col. 1:29; 4:12; 1 Tim. 4:10; 6:12; 2 Tim. 4:7. It is a term of Hellenistic, Jewish, and early Christian exhortation; Nolland 1993a: 733; Hoffmann 1967: 196.

3 For effective refutation, see O'Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O'Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the "lostness" of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

8 In the main, my classification follows Holmes 1989. Manuscript dates are given according to Aland and Aland 1987. Rather than giving priority to any one family of manuscripts, I prefer Holmes's "eclectic" approach to textual criticism.

9 For more details on the relationships of the various textual families, see Holmes 1983 and Metzger 1992.

29 Holtz 1968: 42 argues that λογίζομαι (to reckon) is a sign of LXX influence, claiming that it is not the normal rendering of Hebrew מָנָה (mānâ, to count, measure). The LXX rendering of מנה Niphal is, however, fairly evenly split: twice each by λογίζομαι and ἀριθμέω (to count) and once each by ἐξαριθμέω (to count) and ἀναρίθμητος (innumerable). The presence of λογίζομαι in Luke thus does not indicate his use of the LXX.

52 For another view, see Cadbury 1917. H. J. Holtzmann sees the pericope as contained in Luke's sources (noted by Klostermann 1929: 205).

12 Fitzmyer 1985: 1444–45 rightly stresses the comparative force of ὡσεί (like), elsewhere used by Luke at Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 23:44; 24:11; Acts 1:15; 2:3, 41; 6:15; 10:3; 19:7, 34 (variant reading). On the medical possibilities, see R. Brown 1994: 185; Holzmeister 1938; Keen 1892; and Keen 1897.

31 Hooker 1967: 95–99 is very clear in showing the narrow application of this passage, as well as citing the Jewish background behind it.

12 Hooker's position on authenticity is not entirely clear, although that her remarks end with this observation suggests that she leans toward authenticity.

40 For refutation of France's attempt (1971: 227–39) to tie this remark to a.d. 70, see Marshall 1978: 776–77, who notes that the presence of cosmic signs, the force of Dan. 7:13, and the context all argue against such a view. Marshall also defends the saying's authenticity and rightly questions attempts to reject the saying because of the Synoptic mixture of OT text (Ps. 110 and Dan. 7) or by holding that other sayings such as Mark 8:38 or 14:62 are earlier. Colpe, TDNT 8:450, and Perrin 1967: 173–85 deny authenticity; Hooker 1967: 148–59 and Borsch 1967: 361–64 defend it.

27 Hooker's efforts (1967: 167–71) to argue that riding on the clouds refers to Jesus' exaltation fail on many counts. Seven objections are noted in Bock 1987: 141–42, the most obvious being that (1) an image of Jesus simultaneously sitting by God and riding the clouds seems absurd (unless this is "throne chariot" imagery like Ezek. 1, in which case heavenly rule or return language is present, not the resurrection); (2) Dan. 7 was never used as an ascension proof-text in the NT; and (3) the ascension image is the reverse of Dan. 7 and the apocalyptic discourse, which describe a coming to earth.

6 Marshall 1978: 856 notes Hooker's view (1967: 87–89) that this is not a Lucan creation of a literary detail to make the point about Isaiah.

5 Marshall 1978: 125–26. One can only note the restraint in this account compared to the apocryphal gospels. In contrast, the Jesus Seminar puts Jesus' saying in 2:49 in black type (meaning that it does not go back to Jesus); Funk and Hoover 1993: 275–76. They see the unit as Luke's production, drawing on the child-prodigy genre, the Lucan emphasis on design, and its lack of attestation elsewhere. But these criteria ignore the potential of a unique source surfacing in Luke's research and the evidence for the unit's origins in Palestinian settings (see the discussion above and n. 3). Its enigmatic expression also reflects Jesus' style (see also Nolland 1989: 127–28, who speaks less directly on the issue of historicity in 2:49). That this is the only use of δεῖ relating Jesus to the Father speaks against a Lucan origin. On the historicity of the entire scene, see the exegesis of 2:50.

1 Plummer 1896: 106; Manson 1949: 46 (who strongly defends this view); Dupont 1968: 97–115 (who argues for a middle course between literalism and parable); Carson 1984: 111; Nolland 1989: 177 (who defends the plausibility of Jesus' reporting this event to his disciples). On the other end of the spectrum apparently is Crossan (1991), who does not even discuss this event in his portrayal of Jesus. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 133–34 [Matt.], 278–80 [Luke]) places all the sayings of this unit in black type, thereby indicating rejection of a tie to Jesus. The consensus of the seminar is that the text is legendary, like Greco-Roman biography, and that the sayings were authored by Q following the LXX. The seminar calls it an "ordeal story," but this generic form category does not explain the explicit uniqueness of this confrontation account, a point that negates this argument. Manson 1949: 45–46 rightly challenges the description of the account as legendary (see the discussion of form below). LXX citations reflect only Luke's sensitivity to his Greek audience and are not evidence of the text's origin, since MT renderings would work (Nolland 1989: 177).

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

1 Bultmann 1963: 25–26, 64, 68 opts for a pronouncement story, but also notes the absence of any pronouncement. Jesus' response comes in his simply turning away. This makes a pronouncement account unlikely and explains why the Jesus Seminar makes no comment on the text in The Five Gospels (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316).

1 Dibelius 1934: 160–61, esp. 160 n. 1, says that the general nature of the remark shows that it comes from the evangelist, but how "general principles" can come from the evangelist is not clear. It is the unique attestation of this saying in Luke that appears to be the only reason for this conclusion, along with its possible use of OT imagery from Gen. 19:26. The Jesus Seminar sees these verses as going back to Luke, claiming that the saying assumes too much self-identity for disciples (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316 prints it in black type). But the distinctive behavior and identity are already indicated in the first two sayings, which the seminar accepts. On the rejection of other attempts to argue that the early church is responsible for the sayings, see Marshall 1978: 409, in particular his evaluation of Schulz 1972: 435 n. 239, who relies on Dibelius. Glombitza 1971 also makes a case for Lucan creation.

3 Bultmann 1963: 145 sees much of this material as church formulated and as regulations for the church. Beare 1970 rejects the mission and the discourse's historicity, as does the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 317–23, esp. 320).

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–

93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

3 The Gospel of Thomas 63, 72 has parallel material, but §63 is not primary, as B. Scott 1989: 130–31 correctly argues. However, Scott wrongly asserts that the separation of the question and the parable in the Gospel of Thomas shows that Luke put these two elements together (with Scott, Funk and Hoover 1993: 338 argue that 12:15 was written by Luke, printing it in black type). The Gospel of Thomas lacks any warning, and so is only conceptually parallel. In addition, the general nature of the Gospel of Thomas is to work with only one short saying at a time.

5 But so Schulz 1972: 301–9; rightly refuted by Marshall 1978: 559–60. Multiple levels of the parable tradition (see n. 1 above) teach the kingdom's gradual growth and contrastive transformation. In addition, even the parables of this section appear in various wings of the tradition (Mark and Q [or Matthew]), so that multiple attestation speaks for authenticity. Jeremias 1963a: 146 n. 68 notes the Palestinian coloring in the parables, a point in favor of authenticity. Even the Jesus Seminar accepts the essential authenticity of these parables, printing 13:18–19 in pink type and 13:20–21 in red (Funk and Hoover 1993: 346–47).

1 Also Schulz 1972: 391–98; Crossan 1973: 72; Fitzmyer 1985: 1052. Jeremias 1963a: 63–64, 176 argues that the Gospel of Thomas may be more original than Matthew, except for its expansion of excuses. The Thomas parable is closer to Luke than to Matthew and so is often discussed with Luke's version, but it introduces a fourth figure who cannot come to the banquet. Thomas gives no setting, since the document is just a list of teachings. But the excuses in Thomas use more urban imagery; Luke's use of agrarian imagery fits Jesus' tendency to use agrarian illustrations. Horsley 1987: 180 sees Luke as the more original of the versions, noting that the economically prosperous are the excluded; so also the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 352), though it regards the symposium-table setting as Lucan.

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

4 Soards 1987: 96 mentions 22:39a–b, 40b, 42 as the minimum (he excludes 22:43–44 on textual grounds). Ernst 1977: 607 and Goulder 1989: 741–42 make the best case for additional sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 329 rejects the originality of 22:43–44. For discussion of how the prayer's contents could be known when the disciples are some distance away and asleep, see R. Brown 1994: 174. The Jesus Seminar rejects the historicity of the material on the premise that no one heard the prayer (Funk and Hoover 1993: 391). Brown calls such an objection to historicity a "low level" approach and suggests that the disciples need not have been asleep at this point, although later he suggests that they did not need to hear the prayer because they knew how Jesus prayed. Either explanation is possible. Brown regards the prayer and the event as certain (p. 234), but is less confident of knowledge of the exact words (p. 225). I prefer the view that the event drove the meaning and form of the tradition.

4 J. Green 1988: 282 calls Luke the most primitive form of the tradition. Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–59 is agnostic on historicity, saying that it is impossible to prove. The most detailed English study, Catchpole 1971: 153–220, gives the nod to Luke. For a more skeptical appraisal, giving seven reasons not to accept these accounts as authentic, see E. Sanders 1985: 296–99. For a detailed response to most of his objections, see Bock 1994b. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 392–93) rejects Jesus' prediction (22:61) and the trial dialogue (22:67–69, 70) as inauthentic because 22:61 recalls 22:34 and the absence of disciples at the trial means that no witnesses were present. Jesus' anticipation of Peter's failure, however, reflects his knowledge of how pressure would cause Peter to wilt (the disciples' past record of inconsistency might also contribute to Jesus' expectation). The presence of people like Joseph of Arimathea at the trial makes an internal witness possible.

2 This motive is questionable, since such abruptness did not stop Luke from launching right into a question in 22:67. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1994: 394) takes a similar position, with a more skeptical twist, arguing that the charges are simply created from Scripture in anticipation of 23:38. But a sociopolitical cause for Jesus' crucifixion is a historical certainty. Enough people were present at such a hearing that summaries of its content could become available.

3 The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 397–98) illustrates a more detached approach, arguing that "words ascribed to Jesus after his death are not subject to historical verification" and that claims that Jesus spoke after his death are "beyond the limits of historical assessment." The variation in location and wording thus lead the seminar to print Jesus' reported promise (24:7) in black type. This total skepticism seems to emerge from the seminar's definitional stance and an unwillingness to allow for any degree of summary reporting in the Gospel accounts. For a good attempt to explain both the Galilean and the Jerusalem appearances, see Nolland 1993b: 1181.

3 H. Betz 1969 also strongly argues for "cult legend." According to Betz the account teaches the resurrection's importance for Christian faith. Similar in tone is the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 398–99), which prints 24:17, 19, 25 in black type and says that all the dialogue is "provided by the storyteller" and involves instances of the evangelists "inventing words for Jesus that express their own perspectives."

4 Lucan creation is also the view of the Jesus Seminar, which prints 24:44, 46–49 in black type (Funk and Hoover 1993: 400). In the seminar's view, these verses represent a third commission (Matt. 28:18–20; John 20:22–23). Nolland 1993b: 1225–26 also sees a Lucan development here, though (unlike the Jesus Seminar) he argues that it is a natural development of the tradition that Jesus appeared for a limited time. Nolland says that connection to tradition is possible, but not demonstrable. I prefer to see roots in a tradition and a real event, since Luke does not discuss new scenes elsewhere in his Gospel without the prompting of tradition.

9 Though exceptions do exist; see Jeremias 1963a: 129 and Daube 1955: 334, though his explanation that the father gave property to the younger son but not to the older is not correct, given the end of this verse. On this custom, see Horowitz 1953: 402–21 and Pö;hlmann 1979.

24 Michel, TDNT 8:94–105; M. Stern 1974: 330–34; Donahue 1971; Fitzmyer 1981: 469–70; Badian 1972. E. Sanders 1992: 146–69 notes that the tax system in Palestine was not more oppressive than in other regions. He estimates that taxes consumed somewhere between 20 percent and 30 percent of one's income. For a more skeptical view that sees toll collectors as a symbolic representation of Jesus' outreach to archetypal sinners, see Neale 1991: 110–15. I regard Neale's dichotomy between symbolic representation and history as false for reasons made clear below. In this approach Neale follows Horsley 1987, and both underestimate the connections between John and Jesus in terms of audience. See also 5:29–32.

2 See Borg 1987: 162–63, 170, who notes Jer. 12:7 and Ezek. 11:22–23. So also Horsley 1987: 300–302, who calls Luke 13:32–33 part of a "fairly solid tradition" (p. 190). For the debate on 13:31–33, see Nolland 1993a: 738–39, who accepts 13:31–32, but regards 13:33 as a Lucan redaction that makes the transition from 13:32 to 13:34. However, the use of δεῖ is too widespread in the Gospel tradition to make this conclusion solid (see the exegesis of 13:33). In addition, as Marshall 1978: 570 suggests, 13:33 is an integral link to 13:32.

1 Also Schulz 1972: 391–98; Crossan 1973: 72; Fitzmyer 1985: 1052. Jeremias 1963a: 63–64, 176 argues that the Gospel of Thomas may be more original than Matthew, except for its expansion of excuses. The Thomas parable is closer to Luke than to Matthew and so is often discussed with Luke's version, but it introduces a fourth figure who cannot come to the banquet. Thomas gives no setting, since the document is just a list of teachings. But the excuses in Thomas use more urban imagery; Luke's use of agrarian imagery fits Jesus' tendency to use agrarian illustrations. Horsley 1987: 180 sees Luke as the more original of the versions, noting that the economically prosperous are the excluded; so also the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 352), though it regards the symposium-table setting as Lucan.

6 On cutting off the ear, see Horst, TDNT 5:558, and Marshall 1978: 837. Daube 1960: 59–62 argues that such an act is an indirect insult to the master; cf. 2 Sam. 10:4–5.

19 The shorter reading (i.e., ἰᾶσθαι without any object) has been found in critical texts since Westcott-Hort. Recent texts bracket the object, expressing uncertainty about its presence, even though they retain it.

19 Westcott and Hort 1881: 2.175–77 ("Introduction") call this phrase a "Western noninterpolation" because of this shorter-reading rule. Other such noninterpolations are Luke 22:19b–20; 24:6, 12, 36, 40, 51, 52; Matt. 27:49. A Western noninterpolation is a shorter Western reading, in contrast to the normally expansive pattern of the Western family. Those who call these passages "noninterpolations" are arguing that the Gospel originally omitted them since they are the shorter reading.

25 For an excellent discussion of the history of interpretation of these passages, see Heth and Wenham 1984. For the debate, see House 1990.

8 The grammar of the last phrase is difficult, but the idea is clear. For the options, see BDF §299.4, §360.4; BDR §299.4, §360.4; Moule 1959: 137, 187; Moulton and Howard 1929: 472. It is either a wish or an interjection that has Semitic roots.

9 This classification describes its function most precisely. See also Hubbard 1977 and Tiede 1988: 117 (who prefers to call the account an "epiphany-call" story to emphasize the disclosure of divine presence).

4 The amount of material in these groups can be variously measured, depending on the division of the pericopes and one's judgment about the presence of parallels. Egelkraut 1976: 27 bases the percentages in Luke's central section (for him 9:51–19:48) on the pericope delineation in two common synopses:

	Lucan Parallels to Matthew (i.e., Q)	Unique Lucan Material	Lucan Parallels to Mark
Aland 1985	26 of 75 pericopes (35%)	27 of 75 pericopes (36%)	22 of 75 pericopes (29%)
Huck and Lietzmann 1936	25 of 60 pericopes (42%)	24 of 60 pericopes (40%)	11 of 60 pericopes (18%)

Resseguie 1975: 4 calculates the same section this way: of 60 Lucan pericopes, 31 (52%) parallel Matthew/Q and 29 (48%) are uniquely Lucan. Resseguie argues that only one-tenth of the material in 9:51–18:14 has even a possible Marcan connection. Teaching material that is capable of being repeated might slightly alter the exact count. Nonetheless, the numbers of Huck-Lietzmann and Resseguie are closer to the real percentages, since Luke 9:51–18:14 lacks any significant Marcan parallels. In addition, most of the Q pericopes and unique Lucan material are long units. Conceptual overlap with Matthew and unique Lucan material abound (see the introduction in vol. 1, pp. 10–12). Goulder (1989: 455) notes that in 9:51–13:21 one of every three words comes from Q or L, while in 13:22–18:14 (where Goulder ends the unit) one in six words comes from this material.

9 See McArthur 1960: 105–27; Carson 1984: 126–27; Jeremias 1963b: 1–12, 19–23; Hunter 1965: 107–11; Toussaint 1980: 86–94; Bauman 1985; and J. Martin 1986.

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

24 Schrenk, TDNT 3:236; Hyldahl 1961. The expression for the locale is almost unique for Jewish sources.

1 Marshall 1978: 614–17 has an excellent overview of the difficult issues in this parable. For a historical survey of the parable's interpretation, see Krämer 1972; Ireland 1992: 5–47; and Ireland 1989.

11 This was the most popular position until recently, though it is making something of a comeback (e.g., Blomberg 1990: 244–45; Blomberg 1994; Ireland 1992: 73–82). Plummer 1896: 383 holds a quite plausible variation of this view, arguing that the steward simply lessened the excess cut he took from the debtors, a view close to the "righteous" cut option (no. 3 below), except it suggests that the steward did take something additional. The inflationary trend may suggest that the debtors knew that not all of the money was getting to the owner. Jeremias 1963a: 181 speaks of the steward covering up his previous embezzlements by the new accounting, a view that requires that the master does not have proof for his firing the steward in 16:1–2. Such an internal inconsistency in the parable is unlikely.

33 Ireland 1992: 36, 41 reports that this view goes back to D. Schulz in 1821 and was tied to ancient practice by J. J. Van Oosterzee in 1859. It has recently been defended through appeal to Jewish practice by Derrett 1970: 48–77. Fitzmyer 1964 adds an additional twist to this view: this interest was the steward's commission, making his action of canceling the interest only a clever pretense of personal sacrifice.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: “One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, ‘I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!’ he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies.” 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: “Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, ‘We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.’ / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse” (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

10 Derrett 1977a and Jarvis 1965–66 argue that the subject of the parable is Jesus, who has counted the cost. However, the previous remarks make an exhortation to the multitudes about discipleship far more likely.

8 ᾽Ελάλει could be translated “was continually speaking.” On λαλέω (to speak) in Luke, see Jaschke 1971.

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (gā‘ar, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (gĕ‘ar, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT];

106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

10 Rengstorf 1967 suggests as allusion to the Jewish custom of qēṣ;āṣ;â (קְצָצָה), which cut off from society a member who sold a family heirloom to an outsider or who married beneath their social rank (Jastrow 1903: 1407–8). There is no indication that such a custom applies here, though Rengstorf's study does show the parable's social context and background in terms of the familial symbolism of the ring and robe in 15:22. For refutation, see Marshall 1978: 606 and Bailey 1976: 167–68.

2 Jeremias 1966: 15–84 deals with various aspects of this issue. Other key studies include Hoehner 1977: 74–90; Marshall 1980: 30–75 (which has the advantage of assessing Jeremias's claims); Jaubert 1965; Blinzler 1958; and R. Brown 1962b. For bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1035–40.

60 Marshall sees an allusion to the nations in the wolves of 10:3, but if so the allusion is negative, which does not reinforce the universal element alleged as present here; Jellicoe 1959–60.

10 For details, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.246–50, 287; Wiefel 1988: 47; Schrenk, TDNT 3:262; and esp. Jeremias 1969: 199.

10 SB 1:45–47; m. Ketub. 4.4–5; Jeremias 1969: 364–67; Safrai 1976a: 752–60. The mishnaic text is suggestive for Matt. 1, since the initial realization of her pregnancy might suggest that Mary should be punished (Deut. 22:23–26) or, more leniently, be betrothed, given that premarital intercourse could result in betrothal (Deut. 22:28–29). Cases of rape were handled differently (Deut. 22:25–27).

2 Fitzmyer 1981: 363; BAGD 283; BAA 574. But so argues Jeremias, TDNT 7:92 n. 29. Ἐπαρχεία is used in Acts 23:34 and 25:1.

18 Michel, TDNT 5:129; Jeremias, TDNT 5:681 n. 184, 700; SB 4:213. Lohse, TDNT 8:481, cites the Jewish benediction; cf. also pp. 482, 485.

3 Ἀγραυλοῦντες means "to make one's field [into] one's courtyard or house"; BAGD 13; BAA 23; Schürmann 1969: 108. Shepherds would often work together to provide this protection; Jeremias, TDNT 6:499. Jeremias (pp. 490–91) also points out that the account is not influenced by any literary traditions.

5 R. Brown 1977: 420–24. Marshall 1978: 107–8 rejects this approach. Fitzmyer 1981: 395–96 sees OT influence but rejects a midrashic view. So correctly Jeremias, TDNT 6:490–99, also rejects such connections.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

29 Schweizer 1984: 57; Marshall 1978: 122. Jeremias in his earlier TDNT article, 4:271–72, 276–77, stresses that the dividing point is the presence or absence of faith.

30 R. Brown 1977: 461; Hendriksen 1978: 170; Danker 1988: 68. Jeremias in his later TDNT article, 6:541–42, revised his view.

8 Jeremias 1969: 76–77; Josephus, Life 65 §354 (which notes how few Tiberians [two thousand] were in Jerusalem on one key festival occasion); Antiquities 17.9.3 §§213–14; Jewish War 2.14.3 §280; 2.1.3 §§10–12.

10 Josephus, Antiquities 17.9.3 §213; Jeremias, TDNT 5:898 §1. The reference in the verse to the Passover, τῇ ἑορτῇ τοῦ πάσχα, is grammatically to be taken as a dative of time: “at the time of the feast of the Passover” (Plummer 1896: 74; Luke uses a dative of time at 8:29 and 12:20).

12 Marshall 1978: 127; R. Brown 1977: 474; Jeremias 1969: 58–60; Josephus, Life 52 §269; m. Maʿas. Š. 5.2.

15 Fitzmyer 1981: 468. Jeremias, TDNT 4:269–71, notes that in later Judaism the imagery describes the creation of the nation, as Tg. Isa. 51:1 shows. Bovon 1989: 172 does not consider the allusion likely, since he sees Luke alluding to the Gentiles here. Bovon also distinguishes between a stone (here) and a rock (the OT image). Bovon is right that Luke has an implication here about Gentiles, but that still need not deny the background of the OT, especially since the Greek wording is translated out of the original setting. The OT allusion is possible, though not certain. This remark is also against a view of “covenantal nomism”; see Allison 1987. Placement into blessing is not a matter of election through mere biology.

17 Jeremias, TDNT 4:268, 270, tends to think NT usage is against the wordplay and cites Mark 15:46 as well as Syriac evidence as support.

6 Jeremias, TDNT 1:141, alludes to the second Adam motif here, a point supported by the extension of Luke’s genealogy back to Adam. That the close of the temptation account involves the temple shows a Palestinian, as opposed to a Hellenistic, viewpoint (see the exegesis of 4:9).

9 Bovon 1989: 194 notes that the anaphoric use of the article with πνεῦμα in each Gospel argues for the age of the tradition; Bovon cites Jeremias 1980: 115; Deut. 8:2. On ἤγετο, see Wiefel 1988: 100. Paul has this expression: Rom. 8:14; Gal. 5:18.

33 Jeremias 1958: 44–46; Marshall 1978: 185–86, who notes (though leaning to this view) that the next is also possible.

43 Luke 7:11–17; 17:12–19; Wink 1968: 44; Jeremias, TDNT 2:928–41; France 1971: 48.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

10 Simon-Peter, Thomas-Didymus, Matthew-Levi, Bartholomew-Nathanael (apparently, see the exegesis of 6:14); Plummer 1896: 172, 174; Schürmann 1969: 317–18 n. 49; Jeremias 1971a: 232–33. These variations suggest that the tradition of the list of the Twelve existed in various forms.

29 Marshall 1978: 252; Schürmann 1969: 335–36. Jeremias 1971a: 239–40 notes that these warnings of persecution occur in every strand of Gospel tradition, showing their widespread presence and association to Jesus. Schürmann notes conceptual Lucan parallels in 11:49–52 and 12:11–12. They sound like Matt. 5:11. For a pre-Easter setting, he notes Matt. 10:28–31, 34–39; Mark 6:14–29; 11:1–11, 15–18 as giving evidence of pre-Easter tension.

6 Jeremias, TDNT 6:921. No archeological remains of a gate or of the city wall have yet been found; Nolland 1989: 322.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

4 Jeremias 1963a: 126; Jeremias 1966: 48–49, esp. 48 n. 4; Sir. 31:12, 18 (speaks of sitting); m. Ber. 6.6 (notes two types of sitting). While most of the other texts cited by Jeremias are talmudic, he does note OT texts such as Gen. 27:19; Exod. 32:6; Judg. 19:6; 1 Sam. 20:5, 24–25; 1 Kings 13:20; and Prov. 23:1.

8 Jeremias 1963a: 126, 132 opts for either a prostitute or a woman in a dishonorable vocation, by which he means either an immoral or a dishonest vocation; Jeremias 1969: 303–12; Fitzmyer 1981: 689; Black 1967: 181–83. Marshall 1978: 308 notes correctly that the sins seem to be hers, so that her reputation is not because of association with someone else; so also Wiefel 1988: 154, who thinks she is a prostitute, as does Schürmann 1969: 431 n. 8.

10 1 Cor. 11:5–6; Godet 1875: 1.358. Jeremias 1963a: 126 n. 57 notes that such action in later times could bring grounds for divorce; see *t. Soṭa*5.9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 3.168) and y. Giṭ. 50d (9.11) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 25.254).

16 Fitzmyer 1981: 690 and Marshall 1978: 311 mention that no specific verb for “to thank” exists in Aramaic or Hebrew. Thus, the sense of ἀγαπάω is something like that in Ps. 116:1 [114:1 LXX] or Josephus, Jewish War 1.10.2 §198. See Wood 1954–55 and Jeremias 1963a: 126–27. Fitzmyer adds that in 1QH the Hebrew verb for praise (הוֹדָה, hôdâ) is constantly used to express thanks. What is present is gratitude that also expresses appreciation and love.

21 Fitzmyer 1981: 691 rejects a suggestion of a mistranslation of Aramaic here, as argued by Jeremias 1960b.

1 Jeremias 1963a: 150 n. 81 protests against a name like “parable of the seed among the soils,” when he complains about the title “fourfold field.” On Jeremias’s view, see the exegesis of and the additional note on 8:11. The title “parable of the sower” comes from Matt. 13:18.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

25 Others suggest that ἵνα indicates result. So Danker 1988: 177 argues that ἵνα expresses not purpose, but tragic realization; but see 9:45 and 11:50. Jeremias 1963a: 17 suggests that the parables’ purpose is to fulfill the scriptural promise and thus he sees an ellipse. However, the Isaiah passage is key and is negative. Judgment is expressed here because of hardness of heart.

33 It is important to note that Jeremias's complaint is only about the later origin of the parable's interpretation. Jesus does make these interpretive remarks privately to the disciples at a different time from the giving of the parable, but the elements of obstacle are in the original imagery and so demand interpretation as well. This distinction, however, does not entirely resolve the debate, since other points are also raised to argue for the eschatological view.

34 Marshall 1969 notes that the many Lucan touches in the parable do not alter its basic meaning. See the additional note for more defense of the parable's authenticity and a critique of Jeremias's position.

3 Bovon 1989: 415 speaks of an antithetical word of wisdom. Bultmann 1963: 81–82, 98 calls the sayings "double-stranded" mĕšāllîm, like secular proverbs; also Fitzmyer 1981: 716. Berger 1984: 118 speaks of a warning word for 8:18. Wiefel 1988: 161 also speaks of a māšāl (parable), as does Jeremias 1963a: 41, but this is unlikely. Luke seems aware of the proverbial character by his reuse of the material.

20 On ἄβυσσος, see BAGD 2 §2; BAA 3; Jeremias, TDNT 1:9–10. Perhaps the abyss is equivalent to Tartarus; see Rev. 9:1, 2, 11; 11:7; 17:18; 20:1, 3; cf. Jude 6; 2 Pet. 2:4.

7 On the Elijah hope in Judaism, see Luke 1:17; 7:26–27; Bock 1987: 59–60, 295; Jeremias, TDNT 2:936.

9 See McArthur 1960: 105–27; Carson 1984: 126–27; Jeremias 1963b: 1–12, 19–23; Hunter 1965: 107–11; Toussaint 1980: 86–94; Bauman 1985; and J. Martin 1986.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

5 Jeremias 1971a: 187 argues that the verb ἀναγινώσκω renders Semitic קרא (qr,) and means "to recite," so that Jesus is calling for a specific text. Derrett 1970: 224 n. 1 notes that this view goes back to J. B. Lightfoot.

23 Jeremias 1969: 122–23 argues for twenty-four days, while Heutger 1983: 98 prefers fourteen. But Heutger does not consider the "poor man's" rate, speaking rather of a pensioner's rate of a denarius a week.

5 Marshall 1978: 455 sees either two versions or Matthew's adding to an original short edition like that in Luke. These reflect distinct recensions of Q; but he does not discuss the number of events. Jeremias 1971a: 193–96 argues for the originality of the Lucan form and posits an Aramaic form behind it. He regards its structure as memorable in an oral context, carrying rhyme and a two-four rhythm (so also Meier 1994: 293). Beasley-Murray 1986: 147 argues that Luke's version is original in extent, but that Matthew's is closer to the original wording, a view close to Nolland's (noted above). For him Luke's prayer circulated in Gentile Christian circles, while Matthew's was the Jewish-Christian version. Nevertheless, for him the prayer's roots go back to Jesus. Wiefel 1988: 215 is less certain of this attempt to distinguish communities.

14 Jeremias 1971a: 63–68 notes no example of "my Father" in the literature. In fact, in Judaism such intimacy was avoided. Jeremias 1967b: 16–29 lists the potential Jewish parallels. Dunn 1975: 21–26 notes that Jeremias overstates the case in allowing no exceptions, but suggests that Jeremias's general portrait is correct. Plummer 1896: 296 remarks that God as the Father of Israel is an OT image; the concept of God as Father to individual people begins to appear only in intertestamental Judaism (see the texts in the previous note). Jesus' reference to "my Father" is highly unusual, though not unprecedented: 4Q372; 3 Macc. 6:3; Wis. 14:3; and Sir. 23:1 use "my Father" or "Father." In the NT, see Luke 2:49; 10:22 = Matt. 11:27; Luke 22:29; 24:49; Matt. 7:21; 10:32–33; 12:50; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10, 35; 20:23; 25:34; 26:29, 39, 53. The contrast is striking and significant.

16 Translation from Jeremias 1971a: 198. See also Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 3 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456, 460). However, Jesus' prayer is more like Jewish "short" prayers than this long Jewish liturgical prayer; C. A. Evans 1990: 182. As such, the prayer's form and function come as no surprise in a Jewish context.

18 Jeremias 1971a: 199–201 cites Jerome's Commentary on Matthew on Matt. 6:11 and Marcion. On ancient interpretation, see Fitzmyer 1985: 900, 904–5.

22 On the expression the fathers in Judaism, see Schrenk, TDNT 5:976–77; 1 Esdr. 1:11 [1:12 LXX]; 4:60; 1 Macc. 2:19; 2 Enoch 33.12; 35.2. On the theme of holy graves, see Jeremias 1958a and 1961.

31 Grundmann 1963: 250 suggests that γνώσεως (knowledge) is an objective genitive, thus "the key for knowledge." Another option, a genitive of apposition ("the key that is knowledge," by which is meant "obedient knowledge") is less likely. This latter reading would be an odd way to say "you have taken away knowledge," but so Jeremias, TDNT 3:747–48, who acknowledges that this image, though different from the other option, is similar.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

5 This form of mission statement appears at Qumran; Marshall 1978: 546. 1QH has numerous claims by the Teacher of Righteousness about what God is doing through him. Jeremias 1971a: 293 and n. 6 defends the age of the key tradition in Mark 10:45, another example where multiple traditions are possible with Luke 22:27. As a controversial figure, such statements of purpose from Jesus were inevitable (see Grundmann 1963: 269 for a critique of Bultmann).

17 Νύμφη (lit., bride; BAGD 545 §2; BAA 1103 §2) in this context means "bride" to the mother-in-law (πενθερά; BAGD 642; BAA 1295), thus, daughter-in-law (Marshall 1978: 549; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1099).

6 Comparative παρά may be a Semitism; Jeremias 1963a: 141; Luke 13:4; 18:14; BDF §236.3; BAGD 611 §III.3; BAA 1236 §III.3. The term πάντας must mean all other Galileans; Marshall 1978: 553; Fitzmyer 1985: 1007.

5 But so Schulz 1972: 301–9; rightly refuted by Marshall 1978: 559–60. Multiple levels of the parable tradition (see n. 1 above) teach the kingdom's gradual growth and contrastive transformation. In addition, even the parables of this section appear in various wings of the tradition (Mark and Q [or Matthew]), so that multiple attestation speaks for authenticity. Jeremias 1963a: 146 n. 68 notes the Palestinian coloring in the parables, a point in favor of authenticity. Even the Jesus Seminar accepts the essential authenticity of these parables, printing 13:18–19 in pink type and 13:20–21 in red (Funk and Hoover 1993: 346–47).

9 Paul's image of the olive tree in Rom. 11 is a variation on Jesus' picture. There the key point is not growth, but one's presence in the plant; Egelkraut 1976: 109; Jeremias 1963a: 147–49; Joseph and Asenath 15. On the verb κατασκηνόω (to live or nest), see BAGD 418 §2; BAA 851. Elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 13:32 = Mark 4:32; Acts 2:26.

11 Jeremias 1963a: 147, who cites m. Pe'a 8.7. One is tempted to say that this woman was baking for an army, since this amount could feed over one hundred people.

10 Jeremias notes that the closed door means the irrevocable loss of opportunity; Isa. 22:22; Matt. 25:10; Rev. 3:7.

10 Jeremias, TDNT 5:714, notes that a false prophet ran the risk of being killed (m. Sanh. 11.1). Friedrich, TDNT 6:834–35, points to Matt. 23:37.

See also Fischel 1946.

15 In ancient Judaism, Ps. 118 was seen as messianic; SB 1:849–50, 876; m. Suk. 3.9; Midr. Ps. 118.19–20 on 118:21–22 (= Braude 1959: 2.243–44); Jeremias 1966: 256–57.

1 Also Schulz 1972: 391–98; Crossan 1973: 72; Fitzmyer 1985: 1052. Jeremias 1963a: 63–64, 176 argues that the Gospel of Thomas may be more original than Matthew, except for its expansion of excuses. The Thomas parable is closer to Luke than to Matthew and so is often discussed with Luke's version, but it introduces a fourth figure who cannot come to the banquet. Thomas gives no setting, since the document is just a list of teachings. But the excuses in Thomas use more urban imagery; Luke's use of agrarian imagery fits Jesus' tendency to use agrarian illustrations. Horsley 1987: 180 sees Luke as the more original of the versions, noting that the economically prosperous are the excluded; so also the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 352), though it regards the symposium-table setting as Lucan.

5 See C. Kim 1975 for an ancient invitation. Fitzmyer 1985: 1055 correctly notes that Jeremias's appeal to this as a custom of Jerusalem has only a fifth-century text as support, but Esther and Philo suggest that the custom is possibly older. Nolland 1993a: 755 adds Terence, Self-Tormentor 169–70, and Apuleius, Metamorphoses (Golden Ass) 3.12, which may suggest that more than Jewish custom is in view here.

12 Jeremias 1963a: 177 calls them "the ipso facto beggars in the East." On this theme, see the later Jewish story of Bar Maʿjan; y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.181–82).

17 So Jeremias 1963a: 177, who nonetheless argues that the saying originally ended the parable and was the host's remark. This view, though possible, is not necessary. The application that Jesus makes comes more powerfully and directly by looking back to the parabolic imagery. The shift to the first person indicates the shift of perspective.

23 Jeremias 1963a: 168–69 mentions the option and rightly rejects it, since the issue in Matt. 5:13 = Mark 9:50 and here is taste, not cooking.

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

19 The future tense may have eschatological overtones or it may be a customary future alluding to God's habitual response. The wording may have Aramaic roots and betray a pre-Lucan form; Fitzmyer 1985: 1077–78; Black 1967: 184; Jeremias 1980: 247.

22 This parable contains the only uses of δραχμή in the NT, though the double drachma is found in Matt. 17:24. In LXX, see Gen. 24:22; Exod. 39:3 [38:26 Engl.]; Josh. 7:21; Jeremias 1969: 111.

1 Manson 1949: 284 calls it "The Two Sons," but the father is too crucial to the picture to be left out. Jeremias 1963a: 128 calls it "The Parable of the Father’s Love,” a title that Fitzmyer 1985: 1084 likes. Jesus likes to use the two-son imagery (Matt. 21:28–31).

3 For effective refutation, see O’Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O’Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the “lostness” of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

9 Though exceptions do exist; see Jeremias 1963a: 129 and Daube 1955: 334, though his explanation that the father gave property to the younger son but not to the older is not correct, given the end of this verse. On this custom, see Horowitz 1953: 402–21 and Pö;hlmann 1979.

20 Jeremias 1963a: 130 calls the phrase an Aramaism and cites Tg. 2 Sam. 3:21 (cf. Acts 5:17; 9:6, 18). Fitzmyer 1985: 1089 calls it a Septuagintalism and cites Gen. 22:3, 19; 24:10; 43:8; Tob. 8:10 [8:9 NRSV]. All that this really shows is that the idiom is cross-cultural.

28 Οὗτος (this one) represents contempt in Matt. 20:12; Luke 18:11; Acts 17:18; Jeremias 1963a: 131; BDF §290.6. It will reappear in Luke 23 as the characters discuss and rebuke Jesus (23:2, 35).

3 So, e.g., Jeremias 1963a: 45–48. Marshall 1978: 622–23 notes that even if, as he believes, this is a compilation, the teaching still comes from traditional material. Since he defends the authenticity of 16:13, this seems to imply the authenticity of the whole of 16:9–13. Pilgrim 1981: 127, however, alludes to the work of a Christian preacher or teacher. Talbert 1982: 153 is probably incorrect to call 16:8b an initial interpretation of the parable, since it is really an observation that produces an application only by implication. The phrase but I say to you in 16:9 is the start of the parable's formal application and is not a Lucan expression (Jeremias 1980: 106).

10 Luce 1933: 260 suggests that rent is unlikely since that would be a fixed rate; but if a fraction of anticipated yield was the payment, this figure could also vary. Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that either situation is possible.

11 This was the most popular position until recently, though it is making something of a comeback (e.g., Blomberg 1990: 244–45; Blomberg 1994; Ireland 1992: 73–82). Plummer 1896: 383 holds a quite plausible variation of this view, arguing that the steward simply lessened the excess cut he took from the debtors, a view close to the "righteous" cut option (no. 3 below), except it suggests that the steward did take something additional. The inflationary trend may suggest that the debtors knew that not all of the money was getting to the owner. Jeremias 1963a: 181 speaks of the steward covering up his previous embezzlements by the new accounting, a view that requires that the master does not have proof for his firing the steward in 16:1–2. Such an internal inconsistency in the parable is unlikely.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that the average olive tree yields 120 kilos of olives or 25 liters of oil. Kistemaker 1980: 231 and Manson 1949: 291–92 put the number more precisely at 868 gallons or 3,946 liters, using the scale provided by Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.9 §57. Marshall 1978: 618–19 notes that ancient measuring jars found in archeological digs vary from 5 gallons to 10 gallons. Given this variation, precise numbers are difficult to determine, but the number is not as important as recognizing that this is a large debt.

38 Jeremias 1963a: 182 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1096–99, 1105 regard 16:9–13 as later additions and 16:8 as originally describing Jesus. Fitzmyer includes 16:8b in the applicational expansions and ties it to 16:9, which is problematic given the introductory "and I say to you" in 16:9. I agree that 16:8b is an application of the parable, but it must be seen as the original end to Jesus' remarks, given the break in 16:9a.

39 Jeremias 1963a: 45 gives the details on the absolute use of κύριος to refer to Jesus, which occurs seventeen other times in Luke.

7 1 Enoch 102.9–10 shows the Jewish contempt for the selfish rich. T. Moses 7.3 may apply to the Sadducees or Pharisees. Lachs 1987: 311–12 revives Manson's thesis and rejects the idea that this is a description of the Pharisees. On the Pharisees' relatively modesty means (not every lover of money succeeds in being rich), see Jeremias 1969: 259; Bammel, TDNT 6:901–2.

8 In t. Menaḥ. 13.22 (= Neusner 1977–86: 5.162), the leadership's love of money and hatred of one another is why the temple came to be destroyed; also SB 1:937; 2:222; 4:336–39; Jeremias 1969: 49, 114. Luce 1933: 264 objects to this description, but fails to interact with the ancient sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 245 is right that a story about the afterlife would hardly be a meaningful rebuke to the Sadducees.

4 The Egyptian account is dated before 331 b.c. by Jeremias 1963a: 183 n. 47 (the earliest manuscript is from a.d. 100), but Hock 1987: 452 shows that the Egyptian folk tale is not the likely background, since Luke lacks key elements of it. Hock's appeal, however, to Micyllus in Lucian of Samosata's Gallus and Cataplus likewise errs. These parallels merely show that the theme is a general one in the ancient culture. Hock calls the parable's criterion of judgment unique, but it is not. The standards of care for the needy come from the Torah and should be followed, a common theme for Jesus.

17 Plummer 1896: 393 notes correctly that Abraham's bosom is not a synonym for paradise, but that Abraham is there shows that Lazarus is among the righteous. The image indicates the story's Jewish flavor; so also Jeremias, TDNT 5:769 n. 37, citing T. Abr. (A) 20.13–14.

21 For an attempt to distinguish Hades, Gehenna, and paradise, see Jeremias, TDNT 5:769 n. 37.

29 Jeremias 1963a: 186 argues that purgatory is excluded, but technically this is not correct, since the doctrine of purgatory teaches that the elect go to Hades to be purified. Purgatory must be evaluated on grounds other than this passage. Purgatory is not in view here, but the permanent rejection of the unrighteous is.

32 The present tense λέγει (he says) is a historical present: "he [Abraham] said." This is one of five historical presents in Luke's parables (13:8; 16:7, 23; 19:22). Since Luke normally avoids this tense, it probably indicates pre-Lucan material; Jeremias 1963a: 182–83.

1 Jeremias 1980: 266 argues that ἐντὸς ὑμῶν (in your midst) in 17:21 is not Lucan. Whether Luke worded the introduction is an open question. After a detailed presentation of the options, Zmijewski 1972: 387–90 decides for a special Lucan source.

13 Jeremias 1980: 266 attributes this digression from Luke's common expression to the presence of a traditional source. Also, Mattill 1979: 197 notes that, since the Greek versions variously translate Exod. 34:9 with ἐν μέσῳ (Theodotion, Symmachus) and ἐντός (Aquila), the phrases can be synonymous (Field 1875: 1.144). Beasley-Murray 1986: 101–2 adds a similar example from Exod. 17:7 (Field 1875: 1.111). Note also Symmachus in Lam. 1:3 and Ps. 87:6 LXX [88:6 Engl.] (Field 1875: 747, 239). Meier 1994: 479 notes that this translation appears in the literal Aquila and the more idiomatic Symmachus, making the meaning of ἐντός clear. These ancient texts show that "in the midst" is a well-attested sense for the term.

16 Jeremias discusses the syntax of the questions by noting that the change of mood—from subjunctive to indicative—points to two questions, but one should be careful not to separate them too greatly, given the nature of the reply in 18:8.

11 On lifting the eyes in prayer, see Mark 6:41; 7:34; John 11:41; 17:1; Ps. 123:1; 1 Esdr. 4:58 (in 1 Enoch 13.5 evil angels are too ashamed to look up); Jeremias, TDNT 1:185–86; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377 n. 11. Lifting the hands is a symbol of supplication in the NT; 1 Tim. 2:8. Στῆθος (breast) stands for the person; BAGD 767 and BAA 1532 ("the seat of the inner life"); elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 23:48; John 13:25; 21:20; Rev.

15:6. Jeremias 1963a: 141 at n. 46 says that in Judaism the heart is seen as the seat of sin, but cites as evidence only the late Eccles. Rab. 7.2.5 on 7:2.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 141 overstates the parallelism with Pauline usage, as do Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 and Arndt 1956: 380. Linnemann 1966: 62–63, 144–46 n. 11; Ernst 1977: 497–98; and Marshall 1978: 680–81 are clearer. Cf. Ps. 51:19 [51:21 MT]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 12:7; 1Q28b [= 1QSb] 4.22.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

6 Jeremias 1963a: 99 n. 40 notes eight points of Lucan style: (1) ἀκουόντων δὲ αὐτῶν ταῦτα (cf. Luke 20:45); (2) προστίθημι (Luke seven times, Acts six times, elsewhere in the NT five times); (3) εἶπεν παραβολήν (Luke 6:39; 12:16; 15:3; 18:9; 19:11; 20:19; 21:29); (4) διὰ τό plus the infinitive (Matthew two times, Mark three times, John once, Luke and Acts seven times each); (5) εἶναι after a preposition and article (Matthew and Mark never, Luke seven times, Acts three times); (6) Ἰερουσαλήμ (Luke–Acts sixty-four times, Matthew twice, Mark never); (7) παραχρῆμα (sixteen times in Luke–Acts, elsewhere only Matt. 21:19–20); and (8) ἀναφαίνω (only here and Acts 21:3). Of these points, the middle six are significant, the other two are less clear since they occur too rarely to establish stylistic tendencies.

15 On the difference between burying and wrapping, see Jeremias 1963a: 61 n. 51. Fitzmyer 1985: 1236 is skeptical of what value this difference has for the meaning of this parable, but gives no reason for his doubt (perhaps the late date of the talmudic material?). Either way, the detail reflects a failure to respond to the king.

21 Jeremias 1963a: 62 holds that Jesus' audience interrupted him; so also Plummer 1896: 442, who argues that the crowd thinks Jesus is spoiling the parable; so also Nolland 1993b: 916–17. Klostermann 1929: 189; Marshall 1978: 708; and Danker 1988: 309 hold that the interruption comes from attendants in the parable. If 19:26–27 maintains the parabolic perspective, and 19:27 looks as if it does, then those who react here come from within the parable and comment as a crowd to the king. Of course, since the king represents Jesus, there is no real difference in sense in the choice. If Jesus speaks, he simply gives the parable's lesson.

16 In Gen. 4:10 Abel's spilled blood cries out, and esp. in Hab. 2:11 Jerusalem's stones cry out against Israel's injustice and sin. Marshall 1978: 716 notes the possibility that creation will speak out against the sin of the Pharisees (Jeremias, TDNT 4:270), an option that is less satisfying contextually than the standard OT use of the image; so correctly SB 2:253, which notes the use of this figure in Judaism: Tg. Hab. 2:11; Midr. Ps. 73.4 on 73:10 (= Braude 1959: 2.4).

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been "abandoned" by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

10 The stone as a messianic image in Judaism draws esp. on Isa. 28:16 and Dan. 2:44–45; but see also Gen. 28:17–19; Zech. 4:8–10; 3:8–9; Tg. Ps. 118:24 (printed in Walton 1657: 3.274; see Ellis 1974: 233). For Tg. Isa. 28:16 and other Jewish parallels, see Jeremias, TDNT 4:272–73. Tg. Isa. 28:16(CALTGO) reads: "Behold I set in Zion a king, a mighty king, mighty and terrible, whom I will uphold and strengthen; the prophet says: 'And the righteous in whom is confidence shall not tremble when affliction comes.'"

45 Mattill 1979: 97–100 surveys each NT use of ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη and opts for the usual sense of view 1. He does not, however, give any indication of the debate over 16:8; see also Jeremias 1971a: 135. Jesus' speech most likely would have been in Aramaic, which makes the Semitic point relevant, but only if one assumes a term-for-term rendering. A sense-rendering of Jesus' discourse would escape this objection.

13 Jeremias 1966: 156–59 argues that the short text attempted to preserve a shortened reference to the initial cup without removing it altogether. The short text's goal was to keep the liturgy secret, an explanation that Marshall 1980: 38 rejects. More likely it is a scribal reduction for liturgical reasons.

15 Danker 1988: 345 and Jeremias 1966: 208–9 argue that in preparation for his coming suffering Jesus did not drink the wine. Schürmann 1952: 63–65, Plummer 1896: 495–96, and Marshall 1978: 798 argue that he did drink the wine.

9 Jeremias, TDNT 2:935, likens the account to Elijah's withdrawal in 1 Kings 19:1, 5, 7, but this association is unlikely. Jesus is seeking God's will, while Elijah was depressed.

15 Levey 1974 lists the Jewish passages. Rowley 1950 has a full discussion of the historical issues. Jeremias, TDNT 5:677–700, is more optimistic in his appraisal of this theme in Judaism, but most note that his sources are later than the first century; see Rese 1963. See the discussion of Isa. 53 in the exegesis of Luke 22:37.

2 Jeremias 1966: 15–84 deals with various aspects of this issue. Other key studies include Hoehner 1977: 74–90; Marshall 1980: 30–75 (which has the advantage of assessing Jeremias's claims); Jaubert 1965; Blinzler 1958; and R. Brown 1962b. For bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1035–40.

6 Jeremias objects that, if this theory is correct, the time advance is not one day but only four to six hours. He appeals to Jub. 49.10, 19, and Philo, Special Laws 2.27 §145, to argue against an evening sacrifice.

8 Pickl argues for this distinction by comparing Josephus, Antiquities 3.10.5 §249 and 2.15.1 §317. Jeremias argues that the second text addresses Diaspora practice about all festivals and as such does not apply.

3 The parable of the good Samaritan (10:25–37) also portrays these so-called half-breeds in a good light, a Lucan theme repeated in Luke 4:25–27; Acts 10–11; 26:16–18; 28:26–27. It is too much to see Samaritans as part of Israel; so Jervell 1972: 113–32. That the Samaritans are the target of the church's expansion in Acts 8 also shows that they are not part of Israel.

34 BAGD 54; BAA 107; Sir. 40:30. Luke 18:4 is a conceptual parallel. For the lexical and interpretive debate on the term, see Blomberg 1990: 276, esp. nn. 51–53. For a careful study of ἀναίδεια, see A. Johnson 1979. He argues, however, citing Bailey 1976: 124–33 in support, that the line is about the neighbor, not the host, and that the antecedent of the second αὐτοῦ (his) in 11:8 is the neighbor because the neighbor is the constant subject in the verse. But this ignores αὐτῷ (to him) earlier in the verse, which refers to the host. Johnson sees the point as God's responding because his honor is at stake. But this meaning dishonors the gracious God that Jesus seeks to describe. Johnson is aware of this issue (p. 131 n. 39) and argues that Westerners do not appreciate Eastern cultural values. I hold that it contradicts the tone of 11:11–13.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 53–57; F. F. Bruce 1988: 6–13 (of Acts); Bovon 1989: 23; Kümmel 1975: 151; Danker 1988: 17–18; Tiede 1980: 1–18, 70; Maddox 1982: 6–9; Esler 1987: 27–29; C. A. Evans 1990: 2; C. F. Evans 1990: 14; L. Johnson 1991: 2–3.

13 Fitzmyer 1981: 293; Marshall 1978: 41; Schweizer 1984: 11; Du Plessis 1974: 263–64; Sterling 1992: 334; L. Johnson 1991: 27. NIV and NKJV: "things that/which have been fulfilled." Einheitsübersetzung speaks of events that occurred among us and were fulfilled, combining the first and third meanings.

12 Johnson notes that the desire for possessions may cloud one's willingness to suffer rejection on account of Christ, which is certainly part of Luke's point in having the parable in this setting (see 12:24–34).

2 L. Johnson 1977: 141–43 notes the link between this text and 16:14–18 concerning the dispute over generosity and the law's value. So also T. Schmidt 1987: 155–57 speaks of 16:14–31 as a unit to make the point about this connection. He calls this warning to the godless rich a "polemical blow to opponents [and an] ethical sting to" Luke's readers. The parable is eventually a parable of rejection, and thus a parable of warning.

2 Fitzmyer 1981: 497 rejects M. Johnson's verdict, noting that this alternative requires that Nathan son of David equal Nathan the prophet. Fitzmyer argues that there is no evidence of such an identification in pre-Christian Judaism or in the pre-Lucan Christian community. Zech. 12:12 is key here. Nolland 1989: 170, 172 agrees and argues that the line of Nathan is opened up by the curse on Jeconiah (Jer. 22:30), alternately called Jehoiachin (NIV) or Coniah (NRSV), which prompted Luke to ignore Jewish kings. Nolland does not emphasize a prophetic connection to Nathan. If this view is to be held, this is the way to argue for it.

3 R. Brown 1977: 346–55; Wiefel 1988: 57; Farris 1985: 86–98; Fitzmyer 1981: 359–62; Jones 1968; Bemile 1986: 36. Fitzmyer, agreeing with Winter and Schneider, notes that the hymn is parallel to the psalms in 1 Maccabees, the Qumran Thanksgiving hymns, and the Qumran War Scroll. The hymn also resembles the OT hymns of praise (Ps. 33, 47, 48, 113, 135, 136; one could add to the list 1 Sam. 2:1–10; Jon. 2:2–9 [2:3–10 MT]; Isa. 38:9–20; Tob. 8:15–17; and Sir. 51:1–12). Fitzmyer (p. 359) regards 1:48 as a Lucan insert. In fact, he seems favorable to R. Brown's position that the hymn emerged out of the Jewish-Christian community. Schneider 1977a: 56

sees a Hellenistic Jewish-Christian rewrite of Jewish material or a reworking by Luke himself; so also C. F. Evans 1990: 171–73.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

5 The talmudic text is late, but that the woman in Luke is allowed in makes it likely that this was the custom. B. Ber. 31b relates a parable of a poor man who requests food from a king, suggesting a form of limited access, since he was able to force his way in to see the king (SB 4:615; Jülicher 1899: 2.291). However, it must be admitted that the parallel is distant. B. Ber. 41b relates an exchange between rabbis during a meal, but it is not clear that anyone else is there to hear it. Also relevant is b. B. Bat. 8a, where during a famine a rabbi opens his home to students, but not to the unlearned. When chastised by another rabbi for this, the rabbi relents and allows all to enter. The dilemma of the rabbinic passage is whether one should be generous. Thus, the extrabiblical evidence for an open meal is not great. Still, within the text the evidence suggests such an occasion.

31 Some see in the reference to five brothers a possible allusion to Herod's brothers, but this connection is unlikely (Leaney 1958: 226 notes the view). It is a rich man, not a ruler, who is addressed. Others suggest that five plus one makes six and as such represents the nation's unbelieving half (Jülicher 1899: 2.639). This suggestion also seems unlikely, since "half" the nation did not come to Jesus. Such a detail would suggest allegory, which is not the story's genre.

22 The terms ῥύομαι (to rescue) and σῴζω (to save) occasionally appear together to express the idea of deliverance; Foerster, TDNT 7:990–91; Kasch, TDNT 6:1002; Ps. 7:1–2 [7:2–3 LXX]; 71:2 [70:2 LXX].

26 Foerster, TDNT 2:813. Kasch, TDNT 6:1002, notes that rescue in the NT always refers to God as the rescuer. Rescue texts have strong OT roots; seven of seventeen NT uses of ῥύομαι have OT influence: Luke 1:74; Matt. 27:43; Rom. 11:26; 2 Cor. 1:10a; 2 Thess. 3:2; 2 Tim. 3:11; 4:17.

44 For more recent discussion, see Käser 1968; Schürmann 1969: 304 n. 29; Marshall 1978: 233; Fitzmyer 1981: 610 (who ties it to the apocryphal gospel tradition); Wiefel 1988: 123 (who rejects a connection to Jesus); and Bovon 1989: 267.

16 Keck 1970–71. B. Ḥag. 15a, a talmudic reference of later origin, makes this connection. More recently, Allison 1992 argues vigorously for a connection to Gen. 1:2. The Messianic Vision fragment from Qumran (see photograph and R. H. Eisenman's translation in Biblical Archaeology Review 17.6 [Nov.–Dec. 1991]: 65) might contain an allusion to Messiah and Gen. 1:2. If so, the objection to the lateness of the other Jewish parallels is removed. The image would suggest a "new" beginning in God's work, though I disagree with Allison that the remark is only symbolic, as if one must choose between history and symbol.

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (gā‹ar, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (gĕ‹ar, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT]; 106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

19 The nature and age of the so-called Hebrew version of the Testament of Naphtali is disputed; see H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.775–76.

12 Fitzmyer 1985: 1444–45 rightly stresses the comparative force of ὡσεί (like), elsewhere used by Luke at Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 23:44; 24:11; Acts 1:15; 2:3, 41; 6:15; 10:3; 19:7, 34 (variant reading). On the medical possibilities, see R. Brown 1994: 185; Holzmeister 1938; Keen 1892; and Keen 1897.

13 So Chafer 1951: 410; W. Kelly 1943: 103–6. Popularly known as Scofieldian dispensationalism, this view was made famous in the Scofield Reference Bible. I call this the tribulation-kingdom view because some see the sermon as applicable only in a future kingdom period, while others prefer to see its application beginning in and focusing on the tribulation period.

29 If so, the less natural lexical meaning is not necessary; Marshall 1978: 213; Kelso 1962: 544; Van Der Loos 1965: 441 n. 3.

8 The addition of the missionary emphasis at the end is called secondary on the assumption that multiple forms are not in the original tradition. But most now see that the tradition did reach Mark already in this form. This is an example against the supposed rule, which raises questions about the rule! But for development, see Kertelge 1970: 107. Another key study of this event also seeing stages in the development of the account is Pesch 1972; an earlier English version is Pesch 1971. However, Nolland 1989: 404 rightly sees the double purpose tied to the influence of eyewitness memory, an observation that applies to many fixed-form accounts. The appeal to major stages of development is not necessary.

22 Wellhausen 1904: 550 notes that the Syriac version omitted the term. Fitzmyer 1985: 1147 notes the etymological suggestion of Kilgallen 1982 that the term means “those to whom something is not owed.” Usage is against this sense, though Blomberg 1990: 262 takes it as possible.

5 See C. Kim 1975 for an ancient invitation. Fitzmyer 1985: 1055 correctly notes that Jeremias’s appeal to this as a custom of Jerusalem has only a fifth-century text as support, but Esther and Philo suggest that the custom is possibly older. Nolland 1993a: 755 adds Terence, Self-Tormentor 169–70, and Apuleius, Metamorphoses (Golden Ass) 3.12, which may suggest that more than Jewish custom is in view here.

1 For more detail about the Son of Man debate and an extended version of this excursus, see Bock 1991c. Key recent studies (with full bibliographies) include Colpe, TDNT 8:400–77; Casey 1979; Caragounis 1986; S. Kim 1985; Tö;dt 1979 (whose work Kim in particular critiques).

2 Bock 1987: 133–35. See the exegesis of 21:27 and 22:69 for details. S. Kim 1985: 17–19 seems to overemphasize the divinity of the figure at the expense of the humanity in the picture. The Dan. 7 imagery suggests deity; it does not declare it.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab.

13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

1 See S. Kim 1985: 7–14 for bibliographic details on these scholars. See also excursus 5.

2 Catchpole 1984 argues against historicity on form-critical grounds. For a response, see Witherington 1990: 104–7 and Nolland 1993b: 922–23. Holding to historicity, Kinman 1993 argues for a contrast between this event and Greco-Roman entries of dignitaries. Kinman also argues that Luke tries to show Jesus as a "king like Solomon" who is not a political threat and thus seeks to blunt the charge that Christians are a political threat to Rome. As such, Luke declares the significance to the event by how he tells the whole story of Jesus.

3 On Pilate, see the exegesis of 3:1. Tacitus, Annals 15.44, mentions Pilate's eventual decision; Fitzmyer 1985: 1474. Kinman 1991 considers the setting to be the assize of the Roman governor; Pilate's presence fits this custom. R. Brown 1994: 363–72 has a detailed discussion of the issue of capital punishment, noting that Jews had no authority to execute, except perhaps those who entered prohibited sections of the temple or committed adultery (John 7:53–8:11; m. Sanh. 7.2). John 18:13 thus fits the legal situation of Jesus' time. On Pilate's career in current literature, see R. Brown 1994: 694–705.

4 Marshall 1980: 65–66 regards this series of events as the most problematic reference, but he also notes that it is equally problematic for the day before Passover. On the historicity of the Roman setting and trial customs as tied to the governor's assize, see Kinman 1991.

26 Pesikta Rabbati 36.2 (= Braude 1968: 680–83); Kirk 1972: 95–98; Wiefel 1988: 102. However, the Jewish text is late and it speaks only of his standing on the roof of the temple.

5 Kissinger 1979 overviews recent discussion and gives full bibliographies up to 1977. Blomberg 1990 and B. Scott 1989 update the discussion. Scott attempts a more literary reading of the parables and sees them as a development of the OT מָשָׁל (māšāl). His analyses of structure are often helpful, his handling of historical matters less so.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

38 "When anyone hears the word and does not understand"; Kistemaker 1980: 26. This Matthean touch pictures Satan as capitalizing on an initial lack of response. The blame is not only the devil's and may be a point parallel to Luke's mention of the word's being trod under foot in 8:5. The detail is important, because it suggests the danger of taking the word lightly and indicates the exposed position that rejection of God's word produces.

23 This and Matt. 24:51 are the only two NT uses; in the LXX the word is used in Exod. 29:17. Similar imagery is found in 1 Sam. 15:33; Amos 1:3; and Sus. 55, 59. In the ancient world, see Homer, Odyssey 18.339; Herodotus 2.139. Kistemaker 1980: 125 notes that the contemporary expression "to skin alive" is parallel. 2 Sam. 12:31 and 1 Chron. 20:3 show other ways that slaves were made to labor as a result of being captured in war. This treatment is as severe as it gets.

28 On the general nature of the remarks, see Seesemann, TDNT 5:173. Others have suggested specific groups: (1) church leaders and laity, (2) scribes and Jewish people, (3) Jews and Gentiles, and (4) believers and unbelievers. See Marshall 1978: 544 for a discussion of the first three options and Kistemaker 1980: 127 for the final option. It is too early for a direct reference to the church; so view 1 is unlikely (though the church is the audience to whom Luke applies the parable). There are no Gentiles in the audience, so view 3 is unlikely. A reference to scribes and Jewish people leaves out the most obvious group to be alluded to, that is, the disciples, so view 2 is not adequate either. Against a simple division into believers and unbelievers is the difference in tone between 12:46 and 12:47–48. Probably in view in 12:46 are those like Judas and those like the Jewish leadership who wait for the kingdom but ignore the master and beat his servants. The parable is relevant to Israelites because they perceive themselves as heirs of the kingdom. In addition, though they reject the idea, Jesus came as their king. His remarks show that they defaulted on their role by failing to serve.

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

23 Kistemaker 1980: 212 assumes this background and argues that the equivalent today would be losing a diamond from a wedding ring. If the woman has a dowry, it is not a significant amount. Against this understanding, which must remain only an implication of the text, are Klostermann 1929: 157 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1051.

7 Ἔγνων is a dramatic use of the aorist: “I have determined what I will do,” which might be idiomatically rendered, “I’ve got it!” (Kistemaker 1980: 230–31; Burton 1900: §45; Zerwick 1963: §258). The asyndeton in the verse suggests that the idea came to him suddenly; Plummer 1896: 383.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that the average olive tree yields 120 kilos of olives or 25 liters of oil. Kistemaker 1980: 231 and Manson 1949: 291–92 put the number more precisely at 868 gallons or 3,946 liters, using the scale provided by Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.9 §57. Marshall 1978: 618–19 notes that ancient measuring jars found in archeological digs vary from 5 gallons to 10 gallons. Given this variation, precise numbers are difficult to determine, but the number is not as important as recognizing that this is a large debt.

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life 65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

8 Oepke, TDNT 4:22–24. Kittel, TDNT 1:84 n. 67, argues that the white-robed angels in Luke 24:4 and Acts 1:10 serve to indicate angelic glory. Their radiance finds its source in heaven.

20 On δόξα, see BAGD 204 §2; BAA 410 §2; Schweizer 1984: 83; and Hendriksen 1978: 235–36 (who cites 2 Chron. 9:9–28; Eccles. 2:1–11; Rev. 18:12–13). Kittel, TDNT 2:237, suggests translating the term "radiance." The term alludes to the splendor and value of these kingdoms.

18 On Jesus' word as powerful, see Matt. 8:8, 16; Luke 7:7, 14; Mark 1:24–25; 2:10–12; 4:39; Kittel, TDNT 4:107.

42 Jdt. 13:13; Wis. 5:2; Sir. 43:25; 2 Macc. 9:24; 4 Macc. 2:14. Παράδοξος means something beyond belief or explanation; Kittel, TDNT 2:255.

11 On the authority of Jesus' word, see Matt. 7:29; 8:8; Luke 5:5; Mark 1:25–26; 4:39; Kittel, TDNT 4:107. On cures from afar, see the texts frequently discussed with this one: Matt. 8:8, 13; John 4:50–52; Lohse, TDNT 9:432. Ps. 107:20 stresses healing by a word; Nolland 1989: 317.

7 Δόξα sometimes means "honor"; see Kittel, TDNT 2:237; 1 Cor. 11:15; Eph. 3:13; 1 Thess. 2:6.

9 Kittel, TDNT 1:84 n. 67, sees the white robes as not descriptive of clothing but characterizing the angel's transcendent glory.

22 See Matthew's synonymous phrase child of the kingdom (Matt. 13:38). Child of peace focuses on what one has, while child of the kingdom describes where one resides. Danker 1960–61; Klassen 1980–81. SB 2:166 notes parallel Semitic phrases like child of power, child of knowledge, child of Haggadah, and child of the future world.

33 On Jewish views of forgiveness of sin, see Nolland 1989: 236, who notes key studies: Sjö;berg 1938; Thyen 1970; Gradwohl 1974; and Klauck 1981.

11 Seed as a metaphor for the word is common in the ancient world; Bovon 1989: 407 n. 25; Pseudo-Plutarch, Liberal Education 4 (2B); Plato, Phaedrus 276B–77A; Klauck 1978: 192–96. Ὁ σπείρων is generic in force and should be translated "a sower"; Arndt 1956: 229. Σπεῖραι is an infinitive of purpose: he went out "to sow his seed." On the generic article, see BDF §252 and BDR §252b.

35 Marshall 1978: 324 and Fitzmyer 1981: 713 take the pronoun in the phrase ἔστιν … αὕτη as a predicate, yielding, "The parable means this. …" Bovon 1989: 407 n. 21 prefers a reference back to 8:9 and translates, "This parable is. …" There is little difference in the options. Bovon also notes that this use of the verb recalls Jewish usage, where apocalyptic visions are interpreted. He cites Klauck 1978: 88 n. 273 for details.

1 On allegorical parables, see Derrett 1974; Blomberg 1982a: 6–8; Carlston 1981; and Klauck 1978. On the parable's interpretive history, see Snodgrass 1983: 3–11, who defends authenticity (pp. 2, 87, 103–4, 108, 112). Giblin 1985: 65–66 does not see allegory as a distinct genre of parables, but speaks of the parable's allegorical bent. See also excursus 8, where parable and allegory are seen as part of a literary continuum.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

16 Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:26; Num. 36:13; Deut. 4:40; 10:13; 27:10; 2 Kings 17:13. In Judaism: 1 Macc. 2:21; T. Levi 14.4; T. Judah 13.1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:220; Klostermann 1929: 6; Plummer 1896: 9 (who notes that the terms are synonymous in this usage).

22 On the structure of this verse and Luke's use of ἐγένετο, see Creed 1930: 9; Klostermann 1929: 6–7; Marshall 1978: 54; BDF §472.3.

29 Ps. 110:1; Mark 16:5; Marshall 1978: 55; Klostermann 1929: 7. Danker 1988: 29 is wrong to call it the side of divine authority; this is the meaning only when one is at the right side of God, though the altar does represent approaching God.

31 See Klostermann 1929: 7 for more examples; Marshall 1978: 55 mentions 2 Macc. 3:22–40 as a parallel, where Heliodorus, chief minister to the governor of Syria, suffers a vision that prevents him from entering and defiling the temple. Nolland 1989: 29 suggests that the closest parallel is Dan. 8:17; 9:20–21; 10:7, 15.

45 Samson in Judg. 13:5, 7; 16:17; the Servant in Isa. 49:1; Jeremiah in Jer. 1:5 and Sir. 49:7; Klostermann 1929: 9.

72 Marshall 1978: 62, citing Sahlin 1945a: 96–97. Klostermann 1929: 11 cites B. Weiss, while he seemingly rejects the view.

13 Klostermann 1929: 13. A reference to “her name” or “whose name” following the mention of the Davidic house would have made a Davidic reference to Mary clear; Strathmann, TDNT 4:238.

16 Marshall 1978: 65, who cites H. Gressmann through Klostermann 1929: 13, who in turn prefers חַדְוָ. Greetings of peace are found in Luke 10:5; 24:36; John 20:19, 21, 26.

18 Sibylline Oracles 8.459–72. Klostermann 1929: 13 and Creed 1930: 17 note this ancient interpretation.

29 BDF §177, §233.2; BDR §177.1–2; Marshall 1978: 68; Klostermann 1929: 14. Luke 1:33 is the only use of the verb in the Gospels with reference to Jesus; K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:590. References to his “kingdom” are found in 22:30 and 23:42. Despite the absence of this term, regal reign imagery is found in several other terms and concepts, especially in Luke’s use of Ps. 110:1 in Luke–Acts, as well as in the picture of Jesus’ victory over Satan. In the OT, 2 Sam. 2:4 comes closest to this wording; Nolland 1989: 52.

35 The early critical history of the view is mentioned by Klostermann 1929: 14.

48 Creed 1930: 21; R. Brown 1977: 292; Klostermann 1929: 15; BDF §302.1; BDR §302.1.2. The force is that “nothing at all is impossible” for God.

4 Κ αὶ ἐγένετο (or ἐγένετο δέ) with a verb is a common Lucan expression: 1:5, 8, 23, 41, 59; 2:1, 6; 6:1; 8:22; Fitzmyer 1981: 363; Klostermann 1929: 16–17. On the grammar with ἀκούω, where the genitive indicates the speaker and the accusative the thing heard, see BDF §173 and BDR §173.1–2. Luke 11:31 and 15:25 are grammatically parallel to 1:41.

8 But so argues Creed 1930: 22–23, who draws on the position of Harnack. Also in favor of this view are Danker 1988: 41; Klostermann 1929: 17–18; Bultmann 1963: 296–97; and Luce 1933: 91–92.

13 Charts detailing the various OT parallels in the hymn can be found in Plummer 1896: 30–31; Klostermann 1929: 18–19; and R. Brown 1977: 358–60. The fullest chart including Qumran parallels is Bemile 1986: 116–33. For the connection to 1 Sam. 2, see Goulder 1989: 225–29, who also notes parallels to Ps. 88 and 102.

18 See the discussion of sources in this unit. Klostermann 1929: 19; Luce 1933: 92; Danker 1988: 43; and Creed 1930: 23. The term can be translated “humiliation” (James 1:10; Acts 8:33), as well as “humble state.”

23 Danker 1988: 43–44; Ellis 1974: 76; Klostermann 1929: 20; Godet 1875: 1.104–5; Plummer 1896: 33; Marshall 1978: 84. It must be remembered that Luke presented the passage as Mary’s words, so he must expect them to be read prophetically. Here is another failure of the view (1b) that argues for a reference to Jesus’ work in the past.

24 Διανοίᾳ is singular according to Greek idiom, an idiom that English renders in the plural, “thoughts”; Ps. 75:6 LXX is a grammatical parallel; Klostermann 1929: 20; N. Turner 1963: 23.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

12 For ῥήματα as events see Gen. 24:66; Luke 2:19, 51; Klostermann 1929: 24. It can also refer to words (1 Sam. 3:1, 7).

2 Major discussions can be found in Fitzmyer 1981: 392–93; R. Brown 1977: 411; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Creed 1930: 30–32; Schürmann 1969: 103–4, 108–9, 118–19; Marshall 1978: 96–97; Plummer 1896: 46; Nolland 1989: 98–103; and Ernst 1977: 99.

3 Among the candidates for comparison are Cyrus, Romulus and Remus, Mithras, Osiris, Aion, Virgil, Semiramis, and Moses. For discussions see Creed 1930: 30–32; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Bultmann 1963: 298; Gressmann 1914; and Machen 1930: 348–58 (who has a detailed critique). Virtually no one argues for any direct connection, though most speak of the account's legendary features, because of its supernatural elements.

6 Klostermann 1929: 37. Ἄγγελος is introduced without the definite article. Bovon 1989: 124 thinks that the angel may be Gabriel, but the text does not say.

3 There are many suggestions about Lucan redaction at various spots. Klostermann 1929: 40 sees Luke's hand in 2:22b–23, 29–32, 34–35. R. Brown 1977: 445–47, 452–55 argues for an original tradition that contained what is now 2:27–34; Luke, however, added the hymn. For Brown, the hymn is from the Jewish-Christian Anawim, as were the earlier hymns of Luke 1–2.

1 The view is old. Those who hold it include Bultmann 1963: 300; Creed 1930: 44; Klostermann 1929: 45; Schürmann 1969: 139; Schneider 1977a: 76; Wiefel 1988: 82; and Fitzmyer 1981: 435–36. About the only one who raises doubts is Marshall 1978: 126. Despite the remarks about sources, Coleridge 1993: 187–213 is certainly correct that from a narrative viewpoint this pericope could not be dropped without substantial loss to the infancy narrative. Jesus' remarks about himself are a fitting climax to the prologue. In Coleridge's words (p. 189), this unit is "the most important" of the infancy narrative.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

17 For an example of the form of rabbinic teaching, see m. ›Abot 6.5–6; Klostermann 1929: 47.

2 For characteristic approaches to this issue, often appealing to Q, see Klostermann 1929: 50; Creed 1930: 46–48; Schneider 1977a: 82. Bovon

1989: 165–66 speaks of Q, Mark, and other material. Distinctive is Goulder 1989: 271–72, who argues for Luke's use of Matthew.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

8 Bultmann 1963: 31–32 (where he calls the account an apophthegm or pronouncement story, which he believes grew into this full-blown account); Creed 1930: 65; Schneider 1977a: 106–7; Klostermann 1929: 62; Fitzmyer 1981: 527; Tannehill 1972; C. F. Evans 1990: 266–67 (who notes a series of Lucan expressions in the account); Goulder 1989: 299. For a summary of the recent discussion and a full bibliography on this passage, see Schreck 1989, while Corrington 1993 evaluates a redactional reading of this text with other types of readings.

42 For εἰ μή (in this context: adversative "but"), see Klostermann 1929: 65; Marshall 1978: 189; BDF §448.8.

26 Koch 1969: 7; Hauck, TDNT 4:368 (who suggests this distinction); Fitzmyer 1981: 632–33; Klostermann 1929: 78–79. Guelich 1982: 63–65, 109–11 discusses the options in detail and rejects the absolute distinction.

15 For the latter, see Klostermann 1929: 103 (who rejects it) and Luce 1933: 176 (who opts for a reference in Luke to switching homes). Such a remark in either of the alternative senses adds nothing to the instruction but the obvious. The idea of not switching homes is already implied in the command to stay in the house one enters.

3 Both Klostermann 1929: 32–33 and Hoehner 1977: 14 use Schürer as a starting point.

55 Klostermann 1929: 118 notes six differences between Matt. 13:16–17 and Luke 10:23–24, but this one is the most crucial.

2 Creed misses the point when he says that Jesus' goal is to say that anyone is your neighbor. The answer includes this and more. Klostermann 1929: 118–19 makes the same error in seeing the point as only that the compassionate Samaritan is closer to the kingdom than is the representative of Judaism.

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: "One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, 'I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!' he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies." 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: "Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, 'We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.' / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse" (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

14 Marshall 1978: 539–40 lists the options. He holds to Matthean omission, as does Manson 1949: 117–18. Klostermann 1929: 139 and Ellis 1974: 181 regard it as Lucan. On the assumption that one tradition is present, the influence of additional source material for Luke cannot be ruled out since there is additional material elsewhere in the unit. For defense of its authenticity, see the discussion of sources and historicity above.

22 Fitzmyer 1985: 1002 rejects the spiritual interpretation of 12:57–59, calling it allegorizing. Such a description says more about his seeing the material as derived from Q and reading it accordingly than it does about his literary sensitivity. There is no reason to regard this as a displaced saying about brotherly reconciliation (so Bultmann 1963: 172), since the contextual force is clear. Klostermann 1929: 141 errs in calling the accuser Satan (correctly refuted by Marshall 1978: 551).

2 Marcion, who normally likes Luke's material, omits this section for reasons that are unknown; Klostermann 1929: 141. Luke may lack a parallel at this later point because of the parable here.

9 On the building of aqueducts to improve the city's water supply, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.2 §60; Jewish War 2.9.4 §175; SB 2:197; Klostermann 1929: 143.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

10 Ἀνορθόω is limited to OT quotations in its other NT uses: Acts 15:16; Heb. 12:12; Creed 1930: 183; Klostermann 1929: 145. It was used commonly in medical situations; LSJ 147.

6 See the introduction to this unit. Klostermann 1929: 151 sees Luke reducing the servants to one, while Marshall 1978: 588 prefers to see Matthew expanding the image.

23 Kistemaker 1980: 212 assumes this background and argues that the equivalent today would be losing a diamond from a wedding ring. If the woman has a dowry, it is not a significant amount. Against this understanding, which must remain only an implication of the text, are Klostermann 1929: 157 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1051.

17 Ernst 1977: 464; Klostermann 1929: 163; and Creed 1930: 204 argue that the variation is only for literary value; but ancient parables were based on daily life, so the point may not be an either/or proposition. Derrett 1970: 66, 69 also defends a much higher charge for oil.

9 Klostermann 1929: 166 argues that the Pharisees claimed that their wealth showed God's blessing, but this approach fits the wealthy Sadducees more than the Pharisees.

13 A κύων is a wild, undomesticated dog; BAGD 461; BAA 936; Phil. 3:2; Rev. 22:15; Klostermann 1929: 168.

19 See the unit introduction for a discussion about afterlife symbolism. Klostermann 1929: 168–69 notes the tension and cites 23:43 as another example of instant awareness of blessing after death. Arndt 1956: 365 notes that Acts 7:59; 2 Cor. 5:8; and Phil. 1:23 express a similar hope of instant awareness by the righteous. It may be that instant consciousness occurs in what has been called the "intermediate state," with confirming judgment and glorified resurrection coming later.

5 On the use of φωνή (voice), see Luke 11:27; Acts 4:24; Gen. 39:15, 18; Judg. 21:2; 1 Sam. 11:4; Van Der Loos 1965: 496 n. 4; Klostermann 1929: 173. The call for mercy is also used in the Psalter (e.g., 109:21; Glö;ckner 1983: 139–40), but not much can be made of this general expression, as Nolland 1993a: 846 indicates.

14 So the comparative παρ’ (than); Klostermann 1929: 181; Schrenk, TDNT 2:215 n. 16. Cf. παρά in Ps. 44:8 [45:7 Engl.]; Luke 13:2; BDF §185.3; BDR §185.3 n. 5 and §246.5.

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1224 sees this as the wrong question to ask, since the text does not address the issue. Klostermann 1929: 185 simply says that supernatural knowledge is not expressed by Luke. Luce 1933: 292 takes a rationalistic approach: Jesus inquired about his name, but Luke portrays his knowledge as supernatural. Nolland 1993b: 905 speaks of Jesus’ “uncanny knowledge.”

21 Jeremias 1963a: 62 holds that Jesus’ audience interrupted him; so also Plummer 1896: 442, who argues that the crowd thinks Jesus is spoiling the parable; so also Nolland 1993b: 916–17. Klostermann 1929: 189; Marshall 1978: 708; and Danker 1988: 309 hold that the interruption comes from attendants in the parable. If 19:26–27 maintains the parabolic perspective, and 19:27 looks as if it does, then those who react here come from within the parable and comment as a crowd to the king. Of course, since the king represents Jesus, there is no real difference in sense in the choice. If Jesus speaks, he simply gives the parable’s lesson.

52 For another view, see Cadbury 1917. H. J. Holtzmann sees the pericope as contained in Luke’s sources (noted by Klostermann 1929: 205).

17 The terms for chief priests and scribes are in apposition to elders; BDF §444.4; Klostermann 1929: 220. Matt. 27:1 refers to the chief priests and elders of the people, while Mark 15:1 speaks of chief priests with elders and scribes.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

18 The meaning of οὕτως is not clear (Marshall 1978: 905). Fitzmyer 1985: 1583 argues that it means “so” the Scripture speaks, referring to the manner of the message and thus focusing on its content. It could also be causative (Klostermann 1929: 242, pointing to 24:26), thus meaning “because” the Scripture must be fulfilled. Either possibility makes good sense; the second emphasizes design a little more.

26 Koch 1969: 7; Hauck, TDNT 4:368 (who suggests this distinction); Fitzmyer 1981: 632–33; Klostermann 1929: 78–79. Guelich 1982: 63–65, 109–11 discusses the options in detail and rejects the absolute distinction.

7 On Fitzmyer’s view, see the opening paragraph of the sources and historicity section. Bovon 1989: 202 also argues that the account depicts the victory of faith in the face of opposition. In his view only two texts parallel this account’s point about refusing miracles as signs: Dan. 3 and Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231). But only the latter is really parallel in showing that one does not reveal signs to someone who is unworthy. On Jesus' resisting temptation or persevering in trial, see Luke 22:28; John 6:15, 26–34; 7:1–4; on his refusal to do signs, see Luke 22:39–46; Heb. 2:17–18; 4:15; 5:2. For the history of this text's exegesis, see Kö;ppen 1961.

10 It is difficult to know if Luke's σήμερον (today) refers to morning or late evening. On the time of the cock crowings, see Kosmala 1963–68. If an evening crowing is meant, it is about 3:00 a.m.; if morning, then it is sunrise.

1 Fitzmyer is right to reject other attempts to understand the unit as only a polemic against the Pharisees, though allusions to them are present. Neither is the passage an exposition of Jer. 31:10–20 (so Kossen 1956), a view also rejected by Ellis 1974: 196.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

10 Kö;ster, TDNT 7:884–85, argues that Luke formulated this remark because this usage of συνέχω is unattested; but see Neh. 6:10. Only Kö;ster's improper insistence that a Greek base be present limits the options. It is also unlike Luke to note Jesus' emotions, since he lacks such remarks, unlike the Marcan parallels.

1 Marshall 1978: 614–17 has an excellent overview of the difficult issues in this parable. For a historical survey of the parable's interpretation, see Krämer 1972; Ireland 1992: 5–47; and Ireland 1989.

12 The wording "daughter of Aaron" is not found in the OT, Josephus, Philo, or the rabbis; see K. Kuhn, TDNT 1:4.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 902 mentions the Qumran community prayers, such as the Hôdāyôt or Thanksgiving Psalms. On comparison with the Shemoneh Esreh, see Beasley-Murray 1986: 148–57; K. Kuhn 1950: 30–33, 40–46.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 53–57; F. F. Bruce 1988: 6–13 (of Acts); Bovon 1989: 23; Kümmel 1975: 151; Danker 1988: 17–18; Tiede 1980: 1–18, 70; Maddox 1982: 6–9; Esler 1987: 27–29; C. A. Evans 1990: 2; C. F. Evans 1990: 14; L. Johnson 1991: 2–3.

7 Guthrie 1970 deals with these issues from a conservative, evangelical viewpoint, while the introduction of Kümmel 1975 serves as a good survey of common critical approaches to these issues. See the introduction on "Sources" for these issues as they relate to Luke. Orchard and Riley 1987 detail the ancient testimony of the church on this question.

23 For the debate, see Ladd 1974a; Ladd 1974b: 57–69; Kümmel 1957 (a full presentation of the NT kingdom passages, dividing them into present and/or future aspects); Lundströ;m 1963; Chilton 1984; and Beasley-Murray 1986. For the term in Judaism, see Lattke 1984.

26 On the meaning of φθάνω, see above and Kümmel 1957: 107 n. 8; Ladd 1974b: 65–68; Dodd 1936–37; Marshall 1978: 476. On the verb in NT as "arrival," see Rom. 9:31; Phil. 3:16; and esp. 1 Thess. 2:16, which has a similar present-future tension with its reference to the wrath of God having arrived and residing until the end.

8 Conzelmann 1960: 105 n. 3, 123 suggests that this speech is the "insider" explanation for Jesus' remarks. So also Zmijewski 1972: 417–19, although he acknowledges the possibility of a special Lucan source. Against a Lucan redaction are Kümmel 1957: 29; Colpe, TDNT 8:450–51; and Marshall 1978: 659, who notes that Luke does not create Son-of-Man sayings and that the text has a good claim to authenticity. In addition, the criterion of multiple attestation favors authenticity.

7 The farewell discourse in John 14–17 is another distinct account involving this setting. For biblical and Greco-Roman parallels, see Kurz 1985 and Neyrey 1985: 5–48. Biblical and Jewish precedent for the discourse is found in Gen. 49 (Jacob's final address); Deut. 33 (Moses); Josh. 23 (Joshua); 1 Macc. 2:49–70 (Mattathias); Tob. 4:3–21 (Tobit); the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; and Josephus, Antiquities 4.8.1–48 §§176–322 (Moses).

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

7 1 Enoch 102.9–10 shows the Jewish contempt for the selfish rich. T. Moses 7.3 may apply to the Sadducees or Pharisees. Lachs 1987: 311–12 revives Manson's thesis and rejects the idea that this is a description of the Pharisees. On the Pharisees' relatively modesty means (not every lover of money succeeds in being rich), see Jeremias 1969: 259; Bammel, TDNT 6:901–2.

8 Lachs 1987: 328 argues that the alternation of βρέφος and παιδίον may have behind it a Semitic term that includes both age groups.

5 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; Ps. 34:8 [34:9 MT]; 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1; Nah. 1:7; m. ›Abot 6.3 (God and his teaching). Plummer 1896: 422 argues that a rabbi is never called good in Judaism, but this is wrong; see b. Ber. 5a; b. Ta‹an. 24b; Lachs 1987: 331 nn. 2–3.

13 Later Judaism used a similar saying about an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to refer to an impossible dream or an illogical argument; Lachs 1987: 331–32; b. Ber. 55b; b. B. Mes\;. 38b; SB 1:828; Marshall 1978: 687.

23 For the debate, see Ladd 1974a; Ladd 1974b: 57–69; Kümmel 1957 (a full presentation of the NT kingdom passages, dividing them into present and/or future aspects); Lundströ;m 1963; Chilton 1984; and Beasley-Murray 1986. For the term in Judaism, see Lattke 1984.

26 On the meaning of φθάνω, see above and Kümmel 1957: 107 n. 8; Ladd 1974b: 65–68; Dodd 1936–37; Marshall 1978: 476. On the verb in NT as "arrival," see Rom. 9:31; Phil. 3:16; and esp. 1 Thess. 2:16, which has a similar present-future tension with its reference to the wrath of God having arrived and residing until the end.

28 Ladd 1962 notes four kinds of kingdom sayings: (1) kingdom strictly as rule (Luke 19:12, 15; 23:42; and John 18:36, to which one could add 1 Cor. 15:25); (2) the future apocalyptic order that the righteous will enter at the end of the age (Mark 10:23–30); (3) the kingdom as something present among humans (Matt. 12:28 = Luke 11:20; 17:20); and (4) kingdom as a present realm in which people enter (Col. 1:13, to which could be added 1 Cor. 4:20 and Rom. 14:17).

1 On the Jewish expectations of either a political kingdom or a kingdom coming directly and apocalyptically from God, see Goppelt 1981–82: 1.45–51 and Ladd 1974b: 60–63. Matt. 13:11 calls this gradual growth part of the "mystery" of the kingdom. Matt. 13:52 shows that the kingdom promise contains both new and old things side by side, indicating that NT kingdom revelation supplements and complements OT revelation. Beasley-Murray 1986: 194–201 lists the parables of growth in the Synoptics: mustard seed and leaven (Luke 13:18–21 = Matt. 13:31–33 = Mark 4:30–32), seed growing secretly (Mark 4:26–29), sower (Luke 8:4–8 = Matt. 13:1–9 = Mark 4:1–9), wheat and tares (Matt. 13:24–30), and the dragnet (Matt. 13:47–50).

12 Ladd 1974b: 105–19 shows that the church is not identical to the kingdom, though his view is too abstract in minimizing the reference to a realm. On this latter issue, see Bock 1992c.

30 Lake 1910: 606. Hippolytus was a disciple of Irenaeus, who studied under Polycarp, who in turn studied under the apostle John. As such, Hippolytus might be a significant witness, if one could be sure exactly what he meant.

10 Cranfield 1959: 100–101; Lane 1974: 96–98. Of course, what is true of Mark is also true of the parallels in Matthew and Luke.

6 Bultmann 1963: 246; Creed 1930: 53–54; Lang, TDNT 6:943; Manson 1949: 41. This view usually denies that the historical John saw himself as a precursor to Jesus the Messiah. John was only a prophet warning that the end was near.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

23 For the debate, see Ladd 1974a; Ladd 1974b: 57–69; Kümmel 1957 (a full presentation of the NT kingdom passages, dividing them into present and/or future aspects); Lundströ;m 1963; Chilton 1984; and Beasley-Murray 1986. For the term in Judaism, see Lattke 1984.

2 Egelkraut 1976: 142, esp. n. 3, mentions the options. Schweizer 1984: 174 argues that Luke likes to split accounts from Q and Mark into distinct events (e.g., the Olivet Discourse in 17:22–37 ≈ 21:6–36 and Jesus' condemnation of the religious leadership in 11:37–54 ≈ 20:45–47). Fitzmyer 1985: 843, citing 22:35, argues that Luke created the mission in the split. For detailed discussion of texts where Mark and Q overlap, see Laufen 1980.

68 The view is mentioned and refuted by R. Brown 1977: 282; it is held by Laurentin 1967: 56–64.

17 Laurentin 1967: 75–82, who also cites S. Lyonnet as holding this view. Note also the remark of Zimmerli, TDNT 9:367 n. 66.

22 For this allusion, see Marshall 1978: 66; Leaney 1958: 83; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 46, esp. n. 40; uncertain of it is R. Brown

1977: 299–300; Laurentin 1967: 115.

24 Laurentin 1967: 36; Ps. 48:1 [47:2 LXX]; 76:1 [75:2 LXX]; 86:10 [85:10 LXX]; 96:4 [95:4 LXX]; 135:5 [134:5 LXX]; 145:3 [144:3 LXX]; 147:5 [146:5 LXX]; Fitzmyer 1981: 325, 347. Laurentin may mean by "absolute" that μέγας has no prepositional modifiers, in which case his statement is correct. Μέγας has no modifying role as a dependent adjective.

37 Creed 1930: 19; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 49–50; Fitzmyer 1981: 348–50; Wiefel 1988: 51–52; Ernst 1977: 72; R. Brown 1977: 309. Gewiess, in an appendix to Laurentin's German 1967 edition, interestingly takes a view opposite of Laurentin in the French original and omits Laurentin's own discussion of the question.

53 Laurentin 1957a: 176–88 (this discussion is only in the French edition). The view is first attested in Gregory of Nyssa in A.D.. 386; PG 46:1140D–41A; R. Brown 1977: 304; and Delling, TDNT 5:834–35, esp. n. 55, who prefers to speak of a "virgin conception" as the most accurate way to describe Luke's portrayal. Wiefel 1988: 53 refers to Ambrose, Expositio Evangelii Secundam Lucam 2 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 32:99), and Augustine, De Sancta Virginitate 4 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 41:327). For the full history of exegesis, see Graystone 1968: 3–36.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where

God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

27 In Exod. Rab. 2.2 on 3:1, David and Moses are faithful in tending sheep, so God lets them rule the people. Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 5.1–11 on Exod. 20:2 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.229–30] makes a comparison between overt and secret acts. See also m. ›Abot 3.7; Manson 1949: 293.

11 Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 9 on Exod. 20:21 [= 20:18 in NJPSV] (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.274): "All who are lofty of heart are called an abomination, as it is said, 'Everyone who is lofty of heart is an abomination to the Lord.'" Manson 1949: 295–96 notes that the OT describes idolatry in similar terms (e.g., 1 Kings 11:5). Because it is the ultimate worship of the creature over the Creator, pride may be the most common form of idolatry.

7 While Frg. Tg. Exod. 12:42 provides an example of the rabbis' eschatological reading of this event, appeal is made to Aquila's translation of this verse, which uses παρατήρησις (see also Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Pisḥa 14 on Exod. 12:42 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 1.115–16]). The variety in the ancient tradition shows the age of this association.

16 Leaney 1958: 77 mentions the responses to Jesus and the apostles throughout this book as examples of this theme; Luke 4:22; 6:17; Acts 2:36–37; 4:13–14.

8 1 Chron. 15:24; 2 Chron. 35:8; Neh. 11:12; Fitzmyer 1981: 322; Leaney 1958: 79; Creed 1930: 8. ABD 6:1057–61 records thirty-one individuals with the name Zechariah in the OT and Judaism, four of whom are also mentioned by Josephus (who knows of two more); Schalit 1968: 49.

20 Leaney 1958: 80; SB 2:71. Gen. Rab. 38.14 on 11:29–30 attributes the remark to Rabbi Levi, an ascription that dates the remark to ca. A.D. 300.

39 There are three allusions to eschatological joy in this verse: χαρήσονται, χαρά, and ἀγαλλίασις; Leaney 1958: 80; Marshall 1978: 57. Or as Bovon 1989: 55 says, the joy is for the birth of a prophet. His office is the source of joy. The joy may well start with Elizabeth (1:39–45).

22 For this allusion, see Marshall 1978: 66; Leaney 1958: 83; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 46, esp. n. 40; uncertain of it is R. Brown 1977: 299–300; Laurentin 1967: 115.

31 Danker 1988: 49; Leaney 1958: 24 (who suggests that this hymn originally was tied to Anna [2:38], but then the question is why move it and bring in John the Baptist). Levi is referred to as a priest-king, fulfilling the Maccabean model. Evil king-priests of the Most High appear in T. Moses 6.1.

15 Marshall 1978: 111; Leaney 1958: 96. The appearance of the angel is an angelophany, while the experience of heaven is more like a vision; Michaelis, TDNT 5:351.

9 Leaney 1958: 50–54. Schürmann 1969: 227–28, 241–42 says the source is Q; so also Busse 1978: 113–14 (though he sees Q's influence as more conceptual than verbal, which makes Luke very responsible for the account); Nolland 1989: 192.

28 Leaney 1958: 145; Godet 1875: 1.354–55; Creed 1930: 108; Schürmann 1969: 423–24; Fitzmyer 1981: 680. Geldenhuys 1951: 231 n. 15 notes that the couplet has rhyme in Aramaic.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

12 Bultmann 1963: 114 sees wisdom here. Leaney 1958: 210 cites Matt. 23:34; Luke 2:40, 52; 7:35; 11:31, 49 as parallels. See also 1 Enoch 42. Luke 11:49–51 uses the wisdom motif openly. For more reasons not to see wisdom here, see Bock 1987: 120. Marshall 1978: 573–74 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1034 opt for wisdom terminology, but without Jesus alluding to himself as wisdom, since Jesus sees himself as wisdom's messenger. Sir. 24:7–12 provides a plausible background. If wisdom is in the background, this is the best way to argue for it. Nolland 1993a: 739 questions the presence of wisdom here, as do I.

22 Leaney 1958: 223 prefers to see the verse as ironic and addressed to the Pharisees, but nothing in the context indicates irony or suggests that Pharisees are the most direct audience (though they are the negative, contrastive example). Leaney's view accepts the ironic interpretation of the parable discussed in the additional note on 16:1–13 (view 5).

31 Some see in the reference to five brothers a possible allusion to Herod's brothers, but this connection is unlikely (Leaney 1958: 226 notes the view). It is a rich man, not a ruler, who is addressed. Others suggest that five plus one makes six and as such represents the nation's unbelieving half (Jülicher 1899: 2.639). This suggestion also seems unlikely, since "half" the nation did not come to Jesus. Such a detail would suggest allegory, which is not the story's genre.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that "in your midst" is not possible. Schlosser 1980: 1.202–4 argues that "in one's power" is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for "in the midst of." His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

29 On ἀετός, see Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12; Job 39:27; Matt. 24:28; BAGD 19; BAA 36; Marshall 1978: 669. Ἀετός can refer to an eagle, but not here, since eagles do not seek out dead meat; Rev. 12:14; 4:7; 8:13; Arndt 1956: 376. Attempts to interpret ἀετός as eagle, recalling the Roman emblem that accompanied the invasion of Jerusalem, assume a post–a.d. 70 date for Luke, as well as suggest an image contextually distant from the metaphor here; but so Danker 1988: 294; Leaney 1958: 232; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1173 (with less certainty).

9 This Jewish connection reflects the presence of the tradition (so Leaney 1958: 241–42, against Marshall 1978: 698, who sees a Lucan or edited comment).

11 Note the disciples' reply in Acts 4:19–20 in a religious context; cf. Isa. 10:5–7; Jer. 27:6; Acts 5:29; Leaney 1958: 252. John 19:11 shows that the state's sovereignty is subject to God's authority.

7 For example, Luce 1933: 317 favors the Maccabean date. Leaney 1958: 254–55 discusses it, but his position is less clear, though he does cite 1 Macc. 14:41 as conceptually parallel (i.e., its reference to the "governor and high priest forever"). See also Hardy 1945.

11 Leaney 1958: 259 notes that the Mount of Olives is the locale in 21:37–38, but this later generalized summary tells nothing about the discourse's setting.

21 Fitzmyer 1985: 1337 is against a source. Creed 1930: 255 and Leaney 1958: 260 say Luke inserted the phrase because he was detailing what was sketched in previous verses. Marshall 1978: 764–65 speaks of the great puzzlement that this addition has caused and mentions the possible influence of another source (also Schramm 1971: 174–75). Perhaps this one source had the two eschatological discourses that Luke reflects. But what caused the difference? Did Luke or his source supply a clarifying stylistic break? Either option is possible.

16 On the reference to the vine, see Deut. 22:9; Isa. 32:12; m. Ber. 6.1; b. Ber. 35a. The wording parallels the cup blessing in the Passover meal;

Büchsel, TDNT 1:685. On abstinence, cf. Lev. 10:9; Num. 6:3; Ezek. 44:21; Leaney 1958: 268.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

2 For a good summary of the critical discussion, see Nolland 1989: 351–53, who relies on the approaches of Legault 1954, Lö;ning 1971, and Dupont 1980. Nolland also rightly rejects Brodie's midrashic reading (1983) of this text as an internalization of 2 Kings 4:1–37. The points of connection between 2 Kings 4 and Luke 7 are too general to be compelling. In addition, the function of oil in the two accounts is too different (2 Kings 4:3–7 versus Luke 7:37–38), and the bowing of the Shunammite in 2 Kings 4:37 is a natural expression of respect, not unlike Luke 5:8. Luke 7:37–38 is filled with emotion, a background that 2 Kings 4 lacks.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 696; SB 2:164; Wiefel 1988: 157–58. Grundmann 1963: 174 notes that women could not go into the synagogue or say the Shemaʿ. The late Tosepta text just cited gives the remark of a Jewish leader who rejoices that he is not a pagan, a woman, or unlearned. See also Leipoldt 1955: 69–114 and Witherington 1979.

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

15 Levey 1974 lists the Jewish passages. Rowley 1950 has a full discussion of the historical issues. Jeremias, TDNT 5:677–700, is more optimistic in his appraisal of this theme in Judaism, but most note that his sources are later than the first century; see Rese 1963. See the discussion of Isa. 53 in the exegesis of Luke 22:37.

15 Liefeld 1984: 864; Schulz 1972: 187 n. 98; Foerster, TDNT 5:486; Manson 1949: 44. The picture of the "high mountain" is almost regal imagery and recalls how rulers often lived high on a mountain over their subjects. Such "heavenly journeys" are not unusual: 2 Cor. 12:2–3. C. F. Evans 1990: 258 cites as parallel Deut. 34:1–4, where Moses sees the promised land from a mountain.

3 Godet 1875: 1.255 (who is not shy about seeing distinct events elsewhere); Liefeld 1984: 876. As already noted, Fitzmyer and Schweizer tie the account to John 21.

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are "common people." He sees Jesus' offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–

89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with “common people,” see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus’ effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God’s grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

29 Liefeld 1984: 887. Similar examples existed in Judaism, such as the priority of giving birth or burying the dead versus staying ceremonially clean. Witherington 1990: 68 speaks of the Sabbath’s being a day of renewal and restoration, so that eating a meal is quite appropriate.

4 Schürmann 1969: 395–96; Carson 1984: 200; Liefeld 1984: 897–98. Also noting four options is Busse 1979: 142 n. 3: (1) Luke added the detail, (2) Luke is truer to Q than is Matthew, (3) Luke had another source, and (4) Luke received a pre-Lucan expansion of Q. Busse cannot decide between views 1 and 4. Wiefel 1988: 142 opts for view 4.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

22 Liefeld 1984: 904 ties οὗ χάριν to λέγω (I say) so that the conjunctive phrase syntactically explains the reason of Jesus' reply, not the reason for forgiveness; Moule 1959: 147.

43 Liefeld 1984: 907 cites John 8:31, 44 as examples. If S. Brown 1969: 12–16, 30–31 is correct, then Luke changed the terminology to clarify the text's meaning by leaving out terms capable of being misunderstood.

32 So Cranfield 1959: 176. Plummer 1896: 227 speaks of Kersa, a locale near the lake, but he rejects Origen's association of it with Gergesa. Arndt 1956: 239–40 and Bovon 1989: 434 accept Gergesa as original in Luke. Liefeld 1984: 914–15 is rightly cautious about a solution, as is Nolland 1989: 407. No clearly superior option exists between reading a regional reference or concluding that Gergesa is intended.

5 For the history of interpretation of this passage, see Boobyer 1942: 1–47; Liefeld 1974: 162–65; Baltensweiler 1959. Since no sayings of Jesus appear in this passage, the Jesus Seminar does not discuss it.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99;

Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus’ intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark’s account and does not testify to a separate event.

5 Liefeld 1984: 952 and Plummer 1896: 304 argue that spiritual renewal is the issue, not exorcism. For Liefeld, exorcism would lead to Spirit indwelling. But demons formerly at home now looking for a home suggests exorcism, and there is no guarantee that exorcism automatically produces Spirit indwelling.

19 M. Šeb. 9.1 is important, since it says that rue is not tithed; the presence of this statement in the Mishnah may suggest dispute. The Lucan reference may be to wild rue, not all varieties of rue; Liefeld 1984: 957. The terms are ἡδύοσμον (mint) (BAGD 344; BAA 698; elsewhere only at Matt. 23:23), the hapax legomenon πήγανον (rue) (BAGD 655; BAA 1320), and λάχανον (herb) (BAGD 467; BAA 950; elsewhere only at Matt. 13:32 = Mark 4:32; Rom. 14:2).

13 Liefeld 1984: 968 notes that even in Isa. 11:1–9, where peace is associated with the coming of Messiah, the theme of judgment is present.

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

4 The amount of material in these groups can be variously measured, depending on the division of the pericopes and one's judgment about the presence of parallels. Egelkraut 1976: 27 bases the percentages in Luke's central section (for him 9:51–19:48) on the pericope delineation in two common synopses:

	Lucan Parallels	Unique Lucan	Lucan Parallels

	to Matthew (i.e., Q)	Material	to Mark
Aland 1985	26 of 75 pericopes (35%)	27 of 75 pericopes (36%)	22 of 75 pericopes (29%)
Huck and Lietzmann 1936	25 of 60 pericopes (42%)	24 of 60 pericopes (40%)	11 of 60 pericopes (18%)

Resseguie 1975: 4 calculates the same section this way: of 60 Lucan pericopes, 31 (52%) parallel Matthew/Q and 29 (48%) are uniquely Lucan. Resseguie argues that only one-tenth of the material in 9:51–18:14 has even a possible Marcan connection. Teaching material that is capable of being repeated might slightly alter the exact count. Nonetheless, the numbers of Huck-Lietzmann and Resseguie are closer to the real percentages, since Luke 9:51–18:14 lacks any significant Marcan parallels. In addition, most of the Q pericopes and unique Lucan material are long units. Conceptual overlap with Matthew and unique Lucan material abound (see the introduction in vol. 1, pp. 10–12). Goulder (1989: 455) notes that in 9:51–13:21 one of every three words comes from Q or L, while in 13:22–18:14 (where Goulder ends the unit) one in six words comes from this material.

5 The identity of the child is not given or known. Plummer 1896: 258 mentions a tradition that the church father Ignatius was the child, but this tradition dates from the ninth century: Anastasius Bibliothecarius (PL 129:42); Nicephorus Callistus (PL 143:848); Lightfoot 1889–90: 2.1.27, 2.2.22. Chrysostom and Eusebius lack this tradition.

5 Jeremias 1971a: 187 argues that the verb ἀναγινώσκω renders Semitic קרא (qr,) and means "to recite," so that Jesus is calling for a specific text. Derrett 1970: 224 n. 1 notes that this view goes back to J. B. Lightfoot.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

4 For a detailed argument against authenticity, see Linnemann 1966: 187 n. 14, who argues that the application in 18:8 is too stylistically distinct and that the term ἐκλεκτός (elect) 18:7 is not appropriate in the ministry of Jesus. Linnemann has since renounced this view.

14 Ἀκούσατε is an aorist imperative: "listen now" to what the judge says. Linnemann 1966: 121 n. a says that it is equivalent to "he who has ears, let him hear" in 8:8 and 14:35.

22 Cranfield 1963: 299 n. 1 and Linnemann 1966: 188–89 n. 16 object that the term cannot have this force and challenge the passages where it is said to have this meaning.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 141 overstates the parallelism with Pauline usage, as do Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 and Arndt 1956: 380. Linnemann 1966: 62–63, 144–46 n. 11; Ernst 1977: 497–98; and Marshall 1978: 680–81 are clearer. Cf. Ps. 51:19 [51:21 MT]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 12:7; 1Q28b [= 1QSb] 4.22.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

18 To speak of sinning before heaven is to acknowledge that one has sinned against God; SB 2:217. OT conceptual or idiomatic parallels are found in Exod. 10:16; 1 Sam. 7:6; 20:1; Tob. 3:3; Jdt. 5:17; Sus. 23; Plummer 1896: 374; Manson 1949: 288; Lohfink 1975. Jer. 31:18–20 shows the proper attitude of repentance. In Hos. 2:7 [2:9 MT], Israel returns to her first husband.

14 Exod. 13:3; 15:6; Isa. 5:12; 26:11; 31:3; Ps. 28:5; 1 Chron. 28:19; Creed 1930: 25; Marshall 1978: 90. In the NT, Acts 7:50; Lohse, TDNT 9:431 §C3. Schürmann 1969: 83 n. 20 notes that only Luke uses the phrase “the hand of the Lord” in the NT (Acts 11:21; 13:11; in the LXX, Isa. 41:20; 66:14).

18 Michel, TDNT 5:129; Jeremias, TDNT 5:681 n. 184, 700; SB 4:213. Lohse, TDNT 8:481, cites the Jewish benediction; cf. also pp. 482, 485.

17 Fitzmyer 1981: 410 cites the formulas of praise or confession in Bar. 2:17–18; 1 Esdr. 9:8; 4 Macc. 1:12; Rom. 11:36; and Heb. 13:21. See also Schürmann 1969: 113. Nolland 1989: 108 mentions Ps. Sol. 18.10. The formula corresponds to the Semitic “Hosanna”; Lohse, TDNT 9:683, esp. n. 14.

31 Maurer, TDNT 8:161; Schrage, TDNT 8:288 n. 129; Lohse, TDNT 9:431–32 §C4. In the Marcan examples, this is often requested of Jesus; Nolland 1989: 213.

6 On this passage and various views on the authenticity issue, see also Roloff 1970: 55–62; Lohse, TDNT 7:21–24; Lohse 1960: 84–85; Daube 1972–73: 7–8; and France 1971: 46–47.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

11 On the authority of Jesus’ word, see Matt. 7:29; 8:8; Luke 5:5; Mark 1:25–26; 4:39; Kittel, TDNT 4:107. On cures from afar, see the texts frequently discussed with this one: Matt. 8:8, 13; John 4:50–52; Lohse, TDNT 9:432. Ps. 107:20 stresses healing by a word; Nolland 1989: 317.

3 Schürmann 1969: 200; Fitzmyer 1981: 496; Ernst 1977: 155; Lohse, TDNT 8:486 n. 49. Bovon 1989: 189 calls attempts at harmonization excessive rationalization like that in current fundamentalism. C. F. Evans 1990: 252 calls the task “impossible,” which is excessively skeptical.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1039 remarks that, even though Matt. 12:11 has a similar saying, the rest of the detail is too different to be attributed to Q. In fact, it is too difficult for any other shared tradition. Fitzmyer also correctly denies that Luke 6:9 is a doublet to this verse. Marshall 1978: 578 sees a Q connection as possible. Bultmann 1963: 12 and Lohse, TDNT 7:26, argue that the text was a variant tradition created from Mark 3:1–6, but Ernst 1977: 435 correctly notes that the distinct terminology and motives suggest too much distance for this connection; so also Meier 1994: 710.

2 Marshall 1978: 808 notes the use of “hand” to portray kind intent (Gen. 21:18; Ps. 80:17 [80:18 MT]; 89:21 [89:22 MT]) or hostile intent (1 Sam. 18:21; 22:17; 24:12–13 [24:13–14 MT]; 2 Sam. 14:19). Lohse, TDNT 9:430, argues that “hand” refers to the sharing of the meal; it seems, however, that the allusion is negative, since “hand” is a metonymy for an action performed by someone.

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

49 Chiasmus is a pattern that pairs the first and last ideas in a unit and the second and third ideas (e.g., a-b-b´-a´). When a chiasmus has more than four lines, the pairings continue until the ideas merge at the middle. The thought reverses at the middle back up the chain in the opposite direction. Creed 1930: 11 cites A. Loisy as holding this view.

3 Longenecker 1970: 71–74 cites the example of Simeon ben Kosebah, who, though seen as messianic, had a reticence to claim the title for himself; also Flusser 1959: 107.

2 For a good summary of the critical discussion, see Nolland 1989: 351–53, who relies on the approaches of Legault 1954, Lö;ning 1971, and Dupont 1980. Nolland also rightly rejects Brodie's midrashic reading (1983) of this text as an internalization of 2 Kings 4:1–37. The points of connection between 2 Kings 4 and Luke 7 are too general to be compelling. In addition, the function of oil in the two accounts is too different (2 Kings 4:3–7 versus Luke 7:37–38), and the bowing of the Shunammite in 2 Kings 4:37 is a natural expression of respect, not unlike Luke 5:8. Luke 7:37–38 is filled with emotion, a background that 2 Kings 4 lacks.

33 On the phrase "Moses and the prophets," see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

20 So Cadbury 1956–57: 131, who argues that the meaning "to investigate" is unattested in Greek; so also Ropes 1923–24: 70–71; Luce 1933: 82; Maddox 1982: 4–5; and RSV. Cadbury's argument has roots in an earlier article (1922b), where he notes the six possibilities for the verb.

28 Luce 1933: 82–83. Even though ἄνωθεν in Acts 26:5 means "a long time," it looks back to ἀπ' ἀρχῆς in 26:4, which refers to the earliest point of Paul's ministry.

70 So Winter 1955; also mentioned by older commentators such as Luce 1933: 86 and Alford 1874: 446.

6 For a brief presentation of the argument that rejects historicity, see Luce 1933: 90.

8 But so argues Creed 1930: 22–23, who draws on the position of Harnack. Also in favor of this view are Danker 1988: 41; Klostermann 1929: 17–18; Bultmann 1963: 296–97; and Luce 1933: 91–92.

18 See the discussion of sources in this unit. Klostermann 1929: 19; Luce 1933: 92; Danker 1988: 43; and Creed 1930: 23. The term can be translated "humiliation" (James 1:10; Acts 8:33), as well as "humble state."

13 References to Quirinius are found in Tacitus, Annals 2.30; 3.22–23, 48; and Strabo 12.6.5 (C 569); Luce 1933: 95–96; Fitzmyer 1981: 402; R. Brown 1977: 395.

15 Bultmann, TDNT 2:753; Plato, Statesman 311B; Luce 1933: 101; Plummer 1896: 66, who notes that Philo used the term to describe Abraham

in Who Is the Heir? 6 §22.

9 Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; Matt. 3:7 [the parallel to this pericope]; Luce 1933: 110; Danker 1988: 86; SB 1:114–15; Foerster, TDNT 2:815–16. Acts 28:3 refers to a poisonous snake.

3 Luce 1933: 115. On the other hand, Matt. 4:11 and Mark 1:13 both note the ministry of angels to Jesus at the end of the temptation, a note that Luke lacks.

5 Creed 1930: 73 mentions J. Wellhausen as holding this view. Luce 1933: 127 also discusses this option.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

19 Danker 1988: 128–29 and Luce 1933: 136 overdraw the difference. Marshall 1978: 227 is more balanced.

33 Luce 1933: 160 and Schulz 1972: 380, with most, argue that Luke made the shift to the second person, but it is hard to know which direction the difference went. If the account has polemical roots, a second-person reference may have been the starting point. Schürmann 1969: 426 calls the remark an indictment of the audience.

25 Among those who argue for breaking up the account are Creed 1930: 111–12; Luce 1933: 162–63 (who argues that Luke confused two points here); and Ernst 1977: 258–59.

48 In Luke the hearers are choked, while in Matthew and Mark the word is choked; Luce 1933: 168. The image is similar, for death of the person (the hearer) results in the death of what is in the person (the word).

2 Creed 1930: 120 and Luce 1933: 170–71 both call it a “strange story” and a “popular tale”; see also Bultmann 1963: 210–11. Plummer 1896: 228 lists nine explanations offered for the material.

11 On this title, see Luke 1:32, 35, 76. According to Josephus, Antiquities 16.6.2 §163, this was the Gentile way to refer to the God of the Jews; Luce 1933: 172. So also Plummer 1896: 229–30, citing Dan. 3:26; 4:24 [4:21 MT]; 5:18; 7:18; Bovon 1989: 429 n. 4.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as “legendary.” He suggests a cure by “auto-suggestion,” a rationalistic description that rejects the account’s portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of “grace” as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

33 Plummer 1896: 235; Marshall 1978: 344; Fitzmyer 1981: 746; Bovon 1989: 445–46 (who argues that Luke may be responsible for it); Creed 1930: 123; and Hendriksen 1978: 466 appear undecided. Arndt 1956: 246 and A. B. Bruce 1897: 525 are for inclusion. Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 137; Ellis 1974: 130; and Luce 1933: 173 omit it.

15 For the latter, see Klostermann 1929: 103 (who rejects it) and Luce 1933: 176 (who opts for a reference in Luke to switching homes). Such a remark in either of the alternative senses adds nothing to the instruction but the obvious. The idea of not switching homes is already implied in the command to stay in the house one enters.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked

Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

1 So correctly Luce 1933: 193–94, who is not averse to claiming that sayings are nonhistorical, yet defends historicity here. Marshall 1978: 398 notes the OT conceptual parallel in Num. 11:24–30. To be rejected is Goulder's view (1989: 450) that Luke 9:49–50 is really a subtle defense of Paul before the apostles, a view that looks like F. C. Baur reborn. Goulder is right to reject the view that Jesus endorses non-Christian exorcists here. They cannot act in Jesus' name. Luke has in mind those who have responded to Jesus and have sought to minister for him. He encourages such involvement.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

20 Manson 1949: 262 notes this objection and rejects it, as does Luce 1933: 206–7. Luce notes that those who take the position see the original third man as an Israelite layman, a view mentioned earlier.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

1 Schweizer 1984: 225–26, though noting links to Matthew, suggests that the tradition may have come together before Luke, because of non-Lucan language in 13:25–27. Luce 1933: 240 sees too little correspondence to attribute the material to Q, as does Grundmann 1963: 284, who speaks of a special Lucan source. Michaelis, TDNT 5:71, argues for distinct traditions of the image of the open door.

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

2 Manson 1949: 132 sees the Matthean and Lucan sayings as related. Luce 1933: 251, along with most, calls this a Q passage.

10 Luce 1933: 260 suggests that rent is unlikely since that would be a fixed rate; but if a fraction of anticipated yield was the payment, this figure could also vary. Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that either situation is possible.

35 Bultmann 1963: 175–76, 199–200; so also Grundmann 1963: 318–20, esp. 320, who also argues that Luke changes an original parabolic reference to the master to refer to Jesus. Luce 1933: 260 regards ὅτι (for) in 16:8b as difficult for any other view.

8 In t. Menaḥ. 13.22 (= Neusner 1977–86: 5.162), the leadership's love of money and hatred of one another is why the temple came to be destroyed; also SB 1:937; 2:222; 4:336–39; Jeremias 1969: 49, 114. Luce 1933: 264 objects to this description, but fails to interact with the ancient sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 245 is right that a story about the afterlife would hardly be a meaningful rebuke to the Sadducees.

26 So E. Scott 1924: 91 (cf. Luce 1933: 272): "[Luke] was plainly a man of tender and generous sentiment, who in his warm sympathy for the poor had come to idealize poverty. It need not be doubted that the sayings which he attributes to Jesus are genuine; but he is at pains to put this side of the teaching into the forefront.… The original meaning of the parable may have been little more than that earthly positions will be reversed in the coming age. But the rich man's fate is so presented that he seems to be punished simply because he is rich, while Lazarus is rewarded for his poverty. This false and puerile lesson cannot be that which Jesus intended." Scott reads the parable too much in isolation from Jesus' other teachings and fails to see that material possessions are not the point; the use of them is.

28 So, e.g., Luce 1933: 270 objects to the teaching of an eternal punishment where one cannot be forgiven in the afterlife. This objection, however, is philosophical, not biblical.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1224 sees this as the wrong question to ask, since the text does not address the issue. Klostermann 1929: 185 simply says that supernatural knowledge is not expressed by Luke. Luce 1933: 292 takes a rationalistic approach: Jesus inquired about his name, but Luke portrays his knowledge as supernatural. Nolland 1993b: 905 speaks of Jesus' "uncanny knowledge."

4 Luce 1933: 308 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1279 present the case for nonauthenticity without endorsing it. Snodgrass 1983: 106–10 has a detailed defense of the authenticity of this parable. He concludes: "If one rejects the dominical origin of this parable, he or she does so because of presuppositions about the nature of the Gospels . . . and not because of any element in the parable itself."

7 For example, Luce 1933: 317 favors the Maccabean date. Leaney 1958: 254–55 discusses it, but his position is less clear, though he does cite 1 Macc. 14:41 as conceptually parallel (i.e., its reference to the "governor and high priest forever"). See also Hardy 1945.

25 Plummer 1896: 505 and Luce 1933: 335 make this connection, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1426 says that there is no need to do so. Nolland 1993b: 1073 suggests 2:30 a.m. for the initial crowing and notes that the reference in m. B. Qam. 7.7 forbidding chickens in Jerusalem is probably a later idealization and thus not a historical challenge to this detail.

6 Luce 1933: 349 sees an allusion to Isa. 54:1, but since the images are so different (i.e., in Isaiah the barren will bear a child), this is probably not correct; correctly Marshall 1978: 864 (cf. Luke 1:7, 25; Gal. 4:27) and R. Brown 1994: 923, who cites parallels from Lam. 4:4; Wis. 3:13; Eccles. 4:2–3; 2 Bar. 10.6–10 and argues that Luke received the saying from a sayings source.

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–

56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

8 Dillon 1978: 21–22, who sees Lucan editorial work throughout the resurrection narrative, accepts an outside source here. Luce 1933: 358 says, "Very little in these verses (3–5) … suggests that Luke is using Mark." Marshall 1978: 885 argues that the Johannine parallel shows the traditional point of contact.

13 Luce 1933: 361 thinks the difference shows that 24:12 was not originally in Luke, but the text-critical external evidence is too strong to ignore (see the additional note on 24:12). This does seem to indicate that this account originally circulated independently of 24:1–12.

24 On σωφρονοῦντα (of sound mind), see Luck, TDNT 7:1102, who speaks of the man's being liberated from mania; cf. Acts 26:25.

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

23 For the debate, see Ladd 1974a; Ladd 1974b: 57–69; Kümmel 1957 (a full presentation of the NT kingdom passages, dividing them into present and/or future aspects); Lundströ;m 1963; Chilton 1984; and Beasley-Murray 1986. For the term in Judaism, see Lattke 1984.

17 Laurentin 1967: 75–82, who also cites S. Lyonnet as holding this view. Note also the remark of Zimmerli, TDNT 9:367 n. 66.

9 See McArthur 1960: 105–27; Carson 1984: 126–27; Jeremias 1963b: 1–12, 19–23; Hunter 1965: 107–11; Toussaint 1980: 86–94; Bauman 1985; and J. Martin 1986.

14 This list modifies the one in McArthur 1960: 105–27 by combining several related views.

12 The issue for some Jews was to avoid "fly-impurity," contact with a dead swarming thing from water, which if present, made the hands unclean. Just to be sure, the cup's outside and inside was washed; E. Sanders 1990: 29–42; t. Ber. 5.26 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.31). On Jewish cup tradition, see Maccoby 1982.

22 B. Scott 1989: 232–35 (interacting with McGaughy 1975) appears to see a contrast between Jews and Pharisees, who "freeze" under fear of God by too narrowly preserving the law. There are several problems with this interpretation: (1) it reads the parable too existentially, (2) law is nowhere found in the context, and (3) the leadership is in view in 19:27.

4 This comparative-religions approach was very popular in the early part of the century. Numerous parallels have been noted, though none of them are exact. For a list of such parallels see Ernst 1977: 76 and Marshall 1978: 72–75, both of whom note the parallels and argue that such outside accounts are not the basis of this account (so also esp. Nolland 1989: 47). This is the current consensus, whatever else is said about the material. Machen 1930, though now dated, is the strongest critique against the comparative-religions approach.

38 Machen 1930, though somewhat dated, is still helpful both in rejecting explanations that are grounded in a history-of-religions approach and in evaluating the arguments surrounding the rejection of this teaching; see esp. pp. 126–34, 380–81.

5 Machen 1930: 95–97; Marshall 1978: 79; Schürmann 1969: 79 (who argues that Mary is related to 1:46–49 and that the additional elements came from the community).

9 In other words, one need not think that there was a stenographer present to take down the words on this occasion. But a faithful recollection of remarks at some later point is possible. Machen's remarks about Mary's hymn may well apply to Zechariah's praise; see the discussion of sources in 1:46–56.

3 Among the candidates for comparison are Cyrus, Romulus and Remus, Mithras, Osiris, Aion, Virgil, Semiramis, and Moses. For discussions see Creed 1930: 30–32; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Bultmann 1963: 298; Gressmann 1914; and Machen 1930: 348–58 (who has a detailed critique). Virtually no one argues for any direct connection, though most speak of the account's legendary features, because of its supernatural elements.

6 Unless one approaches the question like Machen 1930: 207–9, who argues that Jacob and Heli were brothers, so Joseph was Jacob's nephew. When Jacob died childless, the nephew became heir.

7 Machen prefers the latter, a choice that Carson fails to mention in critiquing the view. Thus, Machen sees two childless fathers at the end of Matthew's list: Eleazar and Jacob.

4 For evaluation of this issue, see the introduction to the Gospel of Luke under “Sources” and excursus 4. See also McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987.

38 McKnight 1991b outlines the current discussion of the Synoptic problem. See also the introduction to the Gospel of Luke under “Sources” and excursus 4. There is debate whether Q is a single teaching source similar to the collection of sayings in the Gospel of Thomas, or whether this teaching tradition existed in various forms. Those who see Matthew as the first Gospel generally deny the existence of Q.

1 For solid overviews of this area, see McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987. McKnight is slightly more confident than I am of Marcan priority, though I still regard it likely that Mark was the first Gospel written. Still, his and Stein’s overviews show why many think Mark’s Gospel is first. For a comparative study of the two major options in the debate, see Bellinzoni, Tyson, and Walker 1985 and Dungan 1990. A study making significant points about Q and the complex interrelationship of the Gospel writers is Reicke 1986. For the case for Matthean priority, see Farmer 1964.

2 This issue is particularly acute if Matthew was the first Gospel, for Matthew’s eschatological discourse not only has the Olivet remarks but also a series of graphic and theologically significant eschatological parables unique to his treatment. If Matthew is first and Luke knew him, why would Luke leave them out, since he loves parables, including eschatological parables (12:35–48; 18:1–8; 19:11–27)? Matthean prioritists have difficulty explaining this situation, which is a strong argument that Mark was written before Matthew. For how the various Synoptic theories approach this material, see the essays by C. M. Tuckett, F. Neirynck, and A. J. McNicol in Dungan 1990: 63–80, 108–24, 157–200.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 53–57; F. F. Bruce 1988: 6–13 (of Acts); Bovon 1989: 23; Kümmel 1975: 151; Danker 1988: 17–18; Tiede 1980: 1–18, 70; Maddox 1982: 6–9; Esler 1987: 27–29; C. A. Evans 1990: 2; C. F. Evans 1990: 14; L. Johnson 1991: 2–3.

6 For a defense of the unity of Luke–Acts and the prologue as serving both volumes, see Maddox 1982: 4–6. Sterling 1992: 341–45 is balanced, arguing that whatever criticism is present is "subdued."

20 So Cadbury 1956–57: 131, who argues that the meaning "to investigate" is unattested in Greek; so also Ropes 1923–24: 70–71; Luce 1933: 82; Maddox 1982: 4–5; and RSV. Cadbury's argument has roots in an earlier article (1922b), where he notes the six possibilities for the verb.

20 Maddox 1982: 103 notes that the modern pearly-gate picture is not intended to be a conflation of Rev. 21:10–15 and Matt. 16:19 (which is designed to picture reality in detail). The absence of Jesus or God in such eschatology shows it to be only graphic.

46 Ellis appeals to Qumran usage for support (1QpHab 2.7; 7.2) and equates it to the "last hour" in 1 John 2:18. Maddox 1982: 114 rightly asks if Qumran can deliver this extended force.

47 Maddox 1982: 114 suggests that the passage is meaningless without "any identifiable chronological significance."

5 Mahoney argues that Luke's form is drawn from an independent Semitic tradition. If so, in many spots this source is much like Mark.

6 On shame in ancient culture, see Malina and Neyrey 1991; on seating priority, see Neyrey 1991: 366.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

13 Marshall 1978: 140; Luke 7:39, 49; 16:3; 18:4; Black 1967: 302. Manson 1949: 40 notes that the Semitism is reflected in Luke's wording, while Matthew has a more stylized Greek. The verb ἄρχω occurs in the middle voice, ἄρχομαι, meaning "to begin," thirty-one times in Luke and thirteen times in Matthew.

6 Bultmann 1963: 246; Creed 1930: 53–54; Lang, TDNT 6:943; Manson 1949: 41. This view usually denies that the historical John saw himself as a precursor to Jesus the Messiah. John was only a prophet warning that the end was near.

1 Plummer 1896: 106; Manson 1949: 46 (who strongly defends this view); Dupont 1968: 97–115 (who argues for a middle course between literalism and parable); Carson 1984: 111; Nolland 1989: 177 (who defends the plausibility of Jesus' reporting this event to his disciples). On the other end of the spectrum apparently is Crossan (1991), who does not even discuss this event in his portrayal of Jesus. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 133–34 [Matt.], 278–80 [Luke]) places all the sayings of this unit in black type, thereby indicating rejection of a tie to Jesus. The consensus of the seminar is that the text is legendary, like Greco-Roman biography, and that the sayings were authored by Q following the LXX. The seminar calls it an “ordeal story,” but this generic form category does not explain the explicit uniqueness of this confrontation account, a point that negates this argument. Manson 1949: 45–46 rightly challenges the description of the account as legendary (see the discussion of form below). LXX citations reflect only Luke’s sensitivity to his Greek audience and are not evidence of the text’s origin, since MT renderings would work (Nolland 1989: 177).

4 Schürmann 1969: 218; so also Schneider 1977a: 99; C. F. Evans 1990: 256 (who incorrectly calls this the majority view); and Manson 1949: 42–43 (but with no details other than the claim that Matthew’s order makes “a fine dramatic climax” so it is hard to imagine Luke’s altering it if it were the original).

15 Liefeld 1984: 864; Schulz 1972: 187 n. 98; Foerster, TDNT 5:486; Manson 1949: 44. The picture of the “high mountain” is almost regal imagery and recalls how rulers often lived high on a mountain over their subjects. Such “heavenly journeys” are not unusual: 2 Cor. 12:2–3. C. F. Evans 1990: 258 cites as parallel Deut. 34:1–4, where Moses sees the promised land from a mountain.

5 It should be noted that others argue for a change to the third person by Matthew, e.g., Manson 1949: 47. Schürmann 1969: 329 argues that Luke’s source had a second person, while Jesus used the third person originally.

47 Of course, there are limits to this remark. The preferences one speaks about here are not in moral areas where God’s desire is clear, as if people are free to do as they wish without awareness of the moral implications. For how this worked out practically in Jesus' confrontation with the Jewish leadership, see the insightful remarks of Manson 1949: 52–53, who replies to Montefiore's charge (1930: 103–4) that Jesus did not carry out his ethic in practice. Manson emphasizes Jesus' sense of disappointment and sorrow toward his enemies' rejection of him; in addition, Jesus' prophetic challenge shows his regard and concern for his enemies. Manson compares Jesus' relationship with his opponents to that of modern politicians who disagree vigorously in debate but respect one another as people.

13 See 1 Kings 14:15. B. *Ta*ʿ*an.* 20a stresses tenderness, not resoluteness: "Man should strive to be tender like a reed, not hard like the cedar," a text that commends a characteristic the exact opposite of John's; Manson 1949: 68.

4 Fitzmyer 1981: 753 is too cautious here. Marshall 1978: 350 is correct in calling it "one of the best-attested facts in the life of Jesus," following Manson 1949: 73; also V. Taylor 1966: 302. This tradition contains one of the few sayings of Jesus alluded to by Paul (1 Cor. 9:14).

34 BAGD 883, BAA 1762, and esp. Fitzmyer 1985: 853 discusses the uncertainty about Chorazin's exact location: either two to three miles north of Capernaum at Khirbet Karazeh (R. W. Smith in ABD 1:912) or a site on Lake Gennesaret. Wiefel 1988: 198–99 prefers the location near Capernaum, as does Manson 1949: 77. Manson also notes that Bethsaida is on the east side of the Jordan near its entry into the Sea of Galilee, about five miles from Capernaum.

41 Manson 1949: 258 notes that Jesus' passive role argues for authenticity, since God is still the major actor.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

48 See Manson 1949: 79 for a defense of the authenticity of this saying.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

14 Manson 1949: 262 notes both Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §474, who describes the region's barren character, and Jerome, who observes that Arab robbers were frequent on this route in his day some four centuries after Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 593 adds to the list Strabo 16.2.40–41 (c763), who mentions Pompey's problem with robbers and then describes the city.

20 Manson 1949: 262 notes this objection and rejects it, as does Luce 1933: 206–7. Luce notes that those who take the position see the original third man as an Israelite layman, a view mentioned earlier.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

31 Manson 1949: 267 accurately uses the descriptive and emotive term nuisance to describe how the neighbor saw the request.

41 Manson 1949: 265–66 is uncertain about its originality in Luke. Streeter 1924: 277 thinks it original. Ernst 1977: 362 and Fitzmyer 1985: 904 believe it was added later as a baptism formula to be prayed over the individual being baptized. On the use of the prayer in the history of the church, see Manson 1955–56. Besides Marcion and Gregory of Nyssa, the text is found only in manuscripts 162 and 700 and in a shorter form in Maximus the Confessor.

5 Creed 1930: 159 speaks of Q here, as does Manson 1949: 83. The amount of Matthean-Lucan agreement makes this source connection likely, though whether it is Q or another shared tradition is debatable (Matthean prioritists see Matthew as the likely source). Grundmann 1963: 236–37 correctly notes that Matthew is closer to Luke than to Mark (see also Easton 1913, as discussed in n. 1 above). Fitzmyer 1985: 918 argues for Lucan additions in 11:16, but is uncertain about it in 11:14, 21–22. Additional source material cannot be ruled out. Tiede 1988: 216 notes that Matt. 12:23 and Mark 3:11 stress Christology, while Luke emphasizes controversy with the leadership; but Luke also has strong Christology in light of the parable in 11:21–23. Of the three accounts, Mark has less confrontation than the other two.

13 Manson 1949: 83–84. Friedrich, TDNT 6:847, argues that the office of eschatological prophet was the issue. Matthew's discussion of David seems to envision something more; for a discussion of the test, Rengstorf, TDNT 7:234.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson 1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-

Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like “hand of God” (1:66) and “arm of God” (1:51).

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah’s mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

1 Marshall 1978: 491–93 sees different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 96 sees most of Matt. 23 coming from a special Matthean source. Ellis 1974: 170 and Schlatter 1960: 303–5 see a combination of Q and special Lucan material. But Wiefel 1988: 227 objects to this because of the material’s similarity to Matt. 23.

5 In this list, “remark” means a conceptual parallel not laid out as a woe. Fitzmyer notes the order in terms of Lucan verses as follows: 43, 46, 52, 42, [39], 44, 47. Manson has a similar listing (with a dash representing unparalleled material): 46, 52, 42, -, 44, 47–48, -. Interestingly, these two lists do not agree, suggesting that it is hard to know where the matches lie! Apparently Fitzmyer sees a parallel in 11:43 that Manson rejects.

13 Given its position ὑμῶν (your) modifies ἔσωθεν (inside) and refers to the inside of the person, moving from figure to application: “your inside.” It does not refer to the later reference to extortion and wickedness as some suggest. In addition, there is no need to regard this wording as secondary and insist that Jesus kept to the figure throughout; against Manson 1949:

269. Such a view emerges when one ties the account in Luke 11 too closely to Matt. 23 and then tries to decide which wording is original.

17 Manson 1949: 269 favors the suggestion. Grundmann 1963: 248 n. 8 argues the possibility for the original saying, but notes that it cannot be Luke's meaning. Fitzmyer 1985: 947 rejects the option.

30 Note that ἐκζητηθήσεται (shall be required) repeats the verb of 11:50. A key article discussing the options is Chapman 1911–12, with a summary in Manson 1949: 103–5.

32 Matt. 16:19 speaks of the kingdom's keys; Matt. 23:13 speaks of shutting up the kingdom of heaven. Manson 1949: 103 notes that the spirit of Jesus' charge against their lists of requirements might be found in the question, "Where is God the King, the Father, the one who rules with love and mercy in these rules?"

4 On leaven as an evil disposition in Judaism, see SB 1:728–29; Windisch, TDNT 2:905–6; Manson 1949: 270.

14 Manson 1949: 109–10 solves the problem by arguing that "Son of Man" refers to someone other than Jesus, which is linguistically possible but very difficult in Luke, since the title clearly refers to Jesus in 12:8–9. Arguments about what an "original form" of the saying said are purely speculative and do not show why the current sense is really problematic.

2 Manson 1949: 270 (who argues that the connection to 12:1–12 is literary and that 12:13–21 is a self-contained unit inserted between two Q passages) and Schweizer 1984: 207. There is little evidence that Matthew knew of the parable and omitted it, despite what Marshall 1978: 522 suggests, citing Matt. 6:19–20, 25. Fitzmyer 1985: 968 correctly notes that Luke alone gives evidence of this account.

7 Tiede 1988: 233; Ernst 1977: 398; Fitzmyer 1985: 970; Lev. 19:18. Manson 1949: 271 notes the similar OT perspective: Job 31:24–25; Ps. 49; Eccles. 2:1–11. Note also T. Judah 18–19; Sir. 11:18–19; 1 Enoch 97.8–10; Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14; B. Scott 1989: 131–32.

5 Thus, it is useless to speak of the “original form” of this saying, which many regard as Matthew; Manson 1949: 113.

6 Manson 1949: 113 notes that many pagan religions had rituals to coerce the gods to provide material provision.

10 Manson 1949: 114 regards the material as coming from distinct sources, as does Grundmann 1963: 262, though they differ as to which sources and give no reasons. Marshall 1978: 531 argues for the same source, but the distinct wording is a difficulty for that view. Fitzmyer 1985: 981 argues that 12:33a is Lucan and cites 11:41 for support, but that verse is figurative for one’s life and is not similar enough to argue that Luke created this saying. In addition, Fitzmyer argues that Luke abridged Matthew’s saying, but this cannot explain entirely the distinct terminology. Wiefel 1988: 241 sees Q and special L material here that Luke combined to answer the point made in 12:21.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

14 Marshall 1978: 539–40 lists the options. He holds to Matthean omission, as does Manson 1949: 117–18. Klostermann 1929: 139 and Ellis 1974: 181 regard it as Lucan. On the assumption that one tradition is present, the influence of additional source material for Luke cannot be ruled out since there is additional material elsewhere in the unit. For defense of its authenticity, see the discussion of sources and historicity above.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

26 On sin as debt, see Matt. 18:23–25; Luke 7:41–43; 11:2–3; Manson 1949: 122. The image is rhetorical, so there is no need to argue that God cannot be meant, since final judgment is referred to and since no one can "pay" their way out of such a judgment. The rhetoric that "someone will pay" means that "the person will be judged and held accountable for all the sin."

7 For example, Job's friends wrongly but naturally assumed that his initial travail was the consequence of some past sin: Job 4:7; 8:4, 20; 22:5;

also Exod. 20:5; Prov. 10:24–25; John 9:1–3; Plummer 1896: 338; Danker 1988: 259; Manson 1949: 273.

12 In the OT, see 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; Ps. 80:8–19 [80:9–20 MT]; Isa. 5:1–7; 34:4; Jer. 5:17; 8:13; 24:1–8; Hos. 2:12 [2:14 MT]; 9:10; Joel 1:7; Mic. 4:4; 7:1; Hab. 3:17; Matt. 20:1–8; 21:28, 33–41 = Mark 12:1–9 = Luke 20:9–16. In Judaism, see Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 (Charles 1913: 2.775). The picture of caring for the vine makes the figure refer to God's blessings. Manson 1949: 274 notes that in rabbinic literature the fig-tree image often alluded to the law, but that is not its referent in this parable.

14 A cut tree is a common image for judgment: Matt. 7:19; Luke 3:9. Manson 1949: 274–75 portrays the fruitless tree as nothing more than a "glorified weed."

18 The omission of the apodosis is common in Semitic style; BDF §454.4; Acts 23:9; Rom. 9:22–24; Plummer 1896: 340. The apodosis in this case reads "well and good"; Manson 1949: 275.

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

22 Manson 1949: 125–26 notes that this saying rules out the idea of automatic blessing as a result of Abrahamic ancestry. The opposite idea is expressed in Ps. Sol. 9.9–10. Paul's attitude, as expressed in Rom. 9:4–6, is similar to Jesus' remark. Marshall 1978: 568 adds Mark 9:35; Luke 14:9–10; and 1 Cor. 4:9 as being similar in concept, as well as the remarks in Luke 1:51–53 and 3:8. One could also add Eph. 2:14–18, though here the idea of Jews being excluded is not prevalent. Rather Gentiles and Jews form a new community, where those who were far off and those who were near are equal. Paul, however, appears to believe that at some point in the future, Israelites will believe again en masse (Rom. 11:11–27, esp. 11:12, 15, 25–27), which may explain why only "some" are mentioned here as moving from first to last.

14 For this reason Manson 1949: 127 rejects this view, which Ellis 1974: 191 accepts, citing Luke 11:51; 19:46; Acts 7:47. Marshall 1978: 576 notes that when a pronoun is attached to "house" in the sense of "temple," the pronoun refers to God, which is not the case here, since the desolate house is Israel.

3 Manson 1949: 278 notes a passage in Theophrastus, Characters 21.2, where the sign of a proud man is that he seeks the seat beside the host. Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (commenting on Prov. 25:7) has a similar exhortation for people to stay two or three seats down; see also Josephus, Antiquities 15.2.4 §21.

15 Manson 1949: 130 suggests that Isa. 49:6 is alluded to in the parable. Blomberg 1990: 235–36 says that the second invitation merely reflects Middle Eastern custom, but with all the representation present in the parable, surely the arrival of "outsiders" suggests a correspondence in real terms. See R. Martin 1976.

2 Manson 1949: 132 sees the Matthean and Lucan sayings as related. Luce 1933: 251, along with most, calls this a Q passage.

6 Ernst 1977: 448 is hesitant about this connection. Manson 1949: 131 shows the idiom by citing a late Jewish text, b. Taʿan. 7b, where it is said of certain rabbis, “If they hated their beauty, they would be more learned.” The opposite attitude where other things are loved more is found in Luke 14:20 and 18:20–24.

12 Some see a problem in the shepherd’s leaving behind the ninety-nine, but this is probably a detail omitted in the abbreviated telling of the story. ῎Ερημος is an open field, a heath, where the animals grazed; Manson 1949: 283; 1 Sam. 17:28. On the use of the numbers ninety-nine and one, see SB 1:784–85; m. Peʿa 4.1–2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1076.

1 Manson 1949: 284 calls it “The Two Sons,” but the father is too crucial to the picture to be left out. Jeremias 1963a: 128 calls it “The Parable of the Father’s Love,” a title that Fitzmyer 1985: 1084 likes. Jesus likes to use the two-son imagery (Matt. 21:28–31).

11 So Manson 1949: 287, who argues that there is no need to see inconsistency in the parable because the older son is still subject to the father; 15:22–23, 29–30 show that the father is still in control.

18 To speak of sinning before heaven is to acknowledge that one has sinned against God; SB 2:217. OT conceptual or idiomatic parallels are found in Exod. 10:16; 1 Sam. 7:6; 20:1; Tob. 3:3; Jdt. 5:17; Sus. 23; Plummer 1896: 374; Manson 1949: 288; Lohfink 1975. Jer. 31:18–20 shows the proper attitude of repentance. In Hos. 2:7 [2:9 MT], Israel returns to her first husband.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that the average olive tree yields 120 kilos of olives or 25 liters of oil. Kistemaker 1980: 231 and Manson 1949: 291–92 put the number more precisely at 868 gallons or 3,946 liters, using the scale provided by Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.9 §57. Marshall 1978: 618–19 notes that ancient measuring jars found in archeological digs vary from 5 gallons to 10 gallons. Given this variation, precise numbers are difficult to determine, but the number is not as important as recognizing that this is a large debt.

27 In Exod. Rab. 2.2 on 3:1, David and Moses are faithful in tending sheep, so God lets them rule the people. Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 5.1–11 on Exod. 20:2 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.229–30] makes a comparison between overt and secret acts. See also m. ›Abot 3.7; Manson 1949: 293.

40 Fitzmyer 1985: 1096 places Manson 1949: 292 here, though Manson really regards 16:9 as a separate application and so belongs to the 16:8b view. Luke 18:6 is regarded as a parallel example for the use of κύριος.

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

7 1 Enoch 102.9–10 shows the Jewish contempt for the selfish rich. T. Moses 7.3 may apply to the Sadducees or Pharisees. Lachs 1987: 311–12

revives Manson's thesis and rejects the idea that this is a description of the Pharisees. On the Pharisees' relatively modesty means (not every lover of money succeeds in being rich), see Jeremias 1969: 259; Bammel, TDNT 6:901–2.

11 Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 9 on Exod. 20:21 [= 20:18 in NJPSV] (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.274): "All who are lofty of heart are called an abomination, as it is said, 'Everyone who is lofty of heart is an abomination to the Lord.'" Manson 1949: 295–96 notes that the OT describes idolatry in similar terms (e.g., 1 Kings 11:5). Because it is the ultimate worship of the creature over the Creator, pride may be the most common form of idolatry.

26 In ancient Judaism, a woman could not divorce her husband, although (as Manson 1949: 136–37 notes) if a man were immoral she could compel him to divorce her. Manson also notes the exceptional practice of the Jewish community at Elephantine in the fifth century b.c., where women could initiate divorce.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

6 Manson 1949: 144 never really explains how the Lot material in Luke 17 entered Q or why Matthew left it out. To his credit, Wenham notes his three major problems (1984: 149, 157–65), but seems hard-pressed to defend the form of 17:25, 29–30, 31–32. His discussion posits many reasons for the presence of some items. The argument is plausible, even possible, but is it the most likely?

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1168–69 defends the ordinal μίαν as meaning "one," not "first" (against Plummer 1896: 407) or "very much" (against Torrey 1933: 312; Manson 1949: 142) or "just one" (against Rigaux 1970: 410).

2 Fitzmyer wrongly says that Manson 1949: 313 agrees with this position. Manson does hold that Luke's traditional source is responsible for the addition.

9 Manson also notes a wordplay with Aramaic אָזַל (ʾāzal), which can mean both "going away" and "departing life."

19 Dodd 1947: 49 argues that all the language is from the OT, as does Gaston 1970: 359, citing a catena of verses: Jer. 8:18; 9:1; 6:14, 6, 15, 8. Manson 1949: 319–20 cites Jer. 8:18–22, although the whole of Jer. 8:13–22, along with Jer. 6:6–21 and Isa. 29:1–4, might also be relevant. See also Plummer 1896: 451–52. Tiede 1980: 68–86 challenges Gaston's view that Luke has four stages here: salvation to part of Israel, fulfillment of threat, salvation to Gentiles, and the end. He sees a theodicy in Luke–Acts, where Luke explains how Jerusalem crumbled and yet Luke argues that God still will be faithful by restoring Israel. This is quite possible, though Tiede argues for a post–a.d. 70 date for the book, which is less likely.

23 Manson 1949: 320–21 defends the repetitive sense, appealing to poetic parallelism to refute the charge of tautology. However, the pattern of 19:43–44, where each element is distinct, is too clear to accept the objection or Manson's rendering.

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

36 Marshall 1978: 775 notes that, in Greek astrological texts, συνοχή signifies the dismay caused by unfavorable omens, while Manson 1949: 332 says that it denotes "bewildered despair." Conzelmann, TDNT 7:440, says that the apocalyptic coloring is stronger in Luke.

13 Fitzmyer 1981: 293; Marshall 1978: 41; Schweizer 1984: 11; Du Plessis 1974: 263–64; Sterling 1992: 334; L. Johnson 1991: 27. NIV and NKJV: "things that/which have been fulfilled." Einheitsübersetzung speaks of events that occurred among us and were fulfilled, combining the first and third meanings.

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life 65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

27 So Cadbury 1922a: 502–3; Marshall 1978: 42; and RSV. For options, see BAGD 77 §2; BAA 153 §2a.

35 Fitzmyer 1981: 300; Creed 1930: 5; Marshall 1978: 44. K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:506, cites the Lucan usage noted above. In the LXX, ἀσφάλεια normally refers to something that is safe or secure (2 Macc. 3:22), as it does in Acts 5:23. Its use in Luke with a verb of knowing points to a psychological goal. It refers to knowing the truth, but doing so securely.

6 Marshall 1978: 56 points out that the material cannot reflect a church hymn, since it is clearly directed to the situation. Bovon 1989: 51 agrees with Marshall that a nonpoetic approach is best.

13 Lev. 21:7, 14 discusses the laws regarding priestly marriages and restricts the priests to virgins (Marshall 1978: 52). SB 2:68–71 notes that this type of priestly union was encouraged; Plummer 1896: 9. For ancient Jewish rules of marriage, including reference to some Jewish texts after the first century, see G. Moore 1927–30: 2.119–22 and Safrai 1976a: 752–60.

14 Marshall 1978: 52; Schrenk, TDNT 2:189 §C2c (who notes Lucan parallels to the expression in Luke 2:25 and Acts 10:22). In addition, Schrenk notes NT parallels: Abel in Matt. 23:35; Lot in 2 Pet. 2:7–8; prophets in Matt. 13:17; 23:29; and martyrs in Matt. 23:35. The phrase has parallels in the OT (Deut. 6:25; 24:13; Ps. 106:31) and Judaism (Sus. 3; Sir. 44:17); Nolland 1989: 26.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

22 On the structure of this verse and Luke's use of ἐγένετο, see Creed 1930: 9; Klostermann 1929: 6–7; Marshall 1978: 54; BDF §472.3.

23 Exod. 30:1–9; Marshall 1978: 54; Michaelis, TDNT 4:264. For this narrow use of ναός as "Holy Place," see 1 Macc. 1:21–22; Fitzmyer 1981: 323; Schrenk, TDNT 3:232.

29 Ps. 110:1; Mark 16:5; Marshall 1978: 55; Klostermann 1929: 7. Danker 1988: 29 is wrong to call it the side of divine authority; this is the meaning only when one is at the right side of God, though the altar does represent approaching God.

31 See Klostermann 1929: 7 for more examples; Marshall 1978: 55 mentions 2 Macc. 3:22–40 as a parallel, where Heliodorus, chief minister to the governor of Syria, suffers a vision that prevents him from entering and defiling the temple. Nolland 1989: 29 suggests that the closest parallel is Dan. 8:17; 9:20–21; 10:7, 15.

34 Plummer 1896: 12; Marshall 1978: 55. The reaction to Orson Welles's broadcast of the "War of the Worlds" is a good illustration of this phenomenon.

37 Gen. 16:11; 17:19; 1 Kings 13:2; Isa. 7:14; 49:1; also Luke 1:31; Matt. 1:21; Marshall 1978: 56. On the grammar, see BDF §157.2; Matt. 1:21, 23, 25; Luke 1:31; 2:21.

39 There are three allusions to eschatological joy in this verse: χαρήσονται, χαρά, and ἀγαλλίασις; Leaney 1958: 80; Marshall 1978: 57. Or as Bovon 1989: 55 says, the joy is for the birth of a prophet. His office is the source of joy. The joy may well start with Elizabeth (1:39–45).

41 1 Sam. 3:20; Acts 3:24. On the OT background, see R. Brown 1977: 273; Fitzmyer 1981: 326; Marshall 1978: 57.

53 For other OT or Jewish uses of the motif of silence or being struck silent, see Ezek. 3:26; 24:27; 2 Macc. 3:29; Marshall 1978: 61.

60 For this meaning, see Luke 5:22; 7:37; 23:7; 24:16, 31, as well as six times in Acts (with a different force); Plummer 1896: 18; Marshall 1978: 61.

62 On κωφός signifying deafness and muteness, see 1:62 and Philo, Special Laws 4.38 §§197–98; Marshall 1978: 61; Fitzmyer 1981: 329.

72 Marshall 1978: 62, citing Sahlin 1945a: 96–97. Klostermann 1929: 11 cites B. Weiss, while he seemingly rejects the view.

4 This comparative-religions approach was very popular in the early part of the century. Numerous parallels have been noted, though none of them are exact. For a list of such parallels see Ernst 1977: 76 and Marshall 1978: 72–75, both of whom note the parallels and argue that such outside accounts are not the basis of this account (so also esp. Nolland 1989: 47). This is the current consensus, whatever else is said about the material. Machen 1930, though now dated, is the strongest critique against the comparative-religions approach.

5 The arguments here are complex, based on a variety of suppositions, and thus come in a variety of forms. Schürmann 1969: 56–57; Bovon 1989: 64–70; and Schneider 1977a: 48–49 have brief discussions of the details, as does Marshall 1978: 63. Most discussions center on 1:34, so more detail awaits treatment of that verse. Other details related to the discussion are treated as they arise in the verses.

8 Marshall 1978: 76. Marshall's discussion (pp. 72–77) of the question is the best brief treatment currently available, though it is not clear that a "birth secret" is present. Nolland 1989: 46–48 also defends a "traditional" view of historicity.

16 Marshall 1978: 65, who cites H. Gressmann through Klostermann 1929: 13, who in turn prefers חַדְיִ. Greetings of peace are found in Luke 10:5; 24:36; John 20:19, 21, 26.

22 For this allusion, see Marshall 1978: 66; Leaney 1958: 83; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 46, esp. n. 40; uncertain of it is R. Brown 1977: 299–300; Laurentin 1967: 115.

28 Present elements are found in Luke 11:20; 17:21; future in Luke 13:28; Acts 14:22; future and delayed in Luke 19:11; Acts 1:6, 11. In Acts 1, esp. v. 11, the answer to the apostles' question about total restoration is found in the angelic promise of a return; see also Acts 3:18–21; Marshall 1970: 134; Bock 1992c; and Bock 1994c.

29 BDF §177, §233.2; BDR §177.1–2; Marshall 1978: 68; Klostermann 1929: 14. Luke 1:33 is the only use of the verb in the Gospels with reference to Jesus; K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:590. References to his "kingdom" are found in 22:30 and 23:42. Despite the absence of this term, regal reign imagery is found in several other terms and concepts, especially in Luke's use of Ps. 110:1 in Luke–Acts, as well as in the picture of Jesus' victory over Satan. In the OT, 2 Sam. 2:4 comes closest to this wording; Nolland 1989: 52.

42 Marshall 1978: 70–71; Schweizer 1984: 29; Wiefel 1988: 53; Schulz, TDNT 7:400; Schweizer, TDNT 6:405; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.33.6.

44 Marshall 1978: 71 uses the German term Gottgehö;rig to describe his view. In the NT, the title appears in John 1:34; 20:31; Acts 9:20; 2 Cor. 1:19; Gal. 4:4; Heb. 4:14; 1 John 4:15; Rev. 2:18 (C. F. Evans 1990: 165).

49 Jer. 32:17 MT is close in force to the genitive expression here. So the genitive may reflect a Semitic original behind Luke and suggest that he is not responsible for the material in the section; Marshall 1978: 72; Danker 1988: 40; see additional note.

14 Rom. 8:15; John 1:15; Mark 9:24; Marshall 1978: 81. The dative here is a dative of means; BDR §198.4–5.

15 Plummer 1896: 29; Marshall 1978: 81. BDF §189.3 speaks of an ellipsis in the verse.

5 Machen 1930: 95–97; Marshall 1978: 79; Schürmann 1969: 79 (who argues that Mary is related to 1:46–49 and that the additional elements came from the community).

23 Danker 1988: 43–44; Ellis 1974: 76; Klostermann 1929: 20; Godet 1875: 1.104–5; Plummer 1896: 33; Marshall 1978: 84. It must be remembered that Luke presented the passage as Mary's words, so he must expect them to be read prophetically. Here is another failure of the view (1b) that argues for a reference to Jesus' work in the past.

27 Fitzmyer 1981: 368 sees a purpose infinitive here; BDF §391.4 argues for result; Marshall 1978: 85 and Michel, TDNT 4:676, opt for a causal reference.

1 Schürmann 1969: 96 notes the possibility of a Baptist origin, but thinks the source is more likely to be Jewish Christian. R. Brown 1977: 376 opts for a Jewish-Christian source as well. Marshall 1978: 86 is uncertain where the origin lies.

14 Exod. 13:3; 15:6; Isa. 5:12; 26:11; 31:3; Ps. 28:5; 1 Chron. 28:19; Creed 1930: 25; Marshall 1978: 90. In the NT, Acts 7:50; Lohse, TDNT 9:431 §C3. Schürmann 1969: 83 n. 20 notes that only Luke uses the phrase "the hand of the Lord" in the NT (Acts 11:21; 13:11; in the LXX, Isa. 41:20; 66:14).

2 Marshall 1978: 86 speaks of the Jewish berākâ. Berger 1984: 243 calls the Benedictus a psalm of thanksgiving, as does Bovon 1989: 96–97.

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

4 The most detailed recent survey of the issues is Farris 1985: 26–30. Other treatments include R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Fitzmyer 1981: 376–78; Marshall 1978: 86–87; Ernst 1977: 92–94; Wiefel 1988: 62–64; Nolland 1989: 82–85; and Schürmann 1969: 84–85, 88–89, 93–94.

8 The shifts occur at Ps. 90:14; 128:5. Marshall 1978: 87 notes that Daube 1956: 201 speaks of mixed forms.

28 Marshall 1978: 92 cites Luke 8:10; Acts 2:4; 4:29 as grammatical parallels.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

41 Marshall 1978: 94–95. On God or his word as light, see 2 Sam. 22:17, 29; Ps. 119:105; Goulder 1989: 242.

2 Major discussions can be found in Fitzmyer 1981: 392–93; R. Brown 1977: 411; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Creed 1930: 30–32; Schürmann 1969: 103–4, 108–9, 118–19; Marshall 1978: 96–97; Plummer 1896: 46; Nolland 1989: 98–103; and Ernst 1977: 99.

5 R. Brown 1977: 420–24. Marshall 1978: 107–8 rejects this approach. Fitzmyer 1981: 395–96 sees OT influence but rejects a midrashic view. So correctly Jeremias, TDNT 6:490–99, also rejects such connections.

7 All but three NT uses are Lucan: Luke 21:34; 24:4; Acts 12:7; 23:11; 1 Thess. 5:3; 2 Tim. 4:2, 6; Marshall 1978: 109; Danker 1988: 56–57.

15 Marshall 1978: 111; Leaney 1958: 96. The appearance of the angel is an angelophany, while the experience of heaven is more like a vision; Michaelis, TDNT 5:351.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

29 Some add an association between swaddling clothes and Messiah in Lam. Rab. 1.51 on 1:16, an approach discussed and rejected by Marshall 1978: 107.

31 Marshall 1978: 108. Supporting the addition are A, D, Θ, Ψ, family 13, Byz, and some Latin and Syriac versions. The harder-reading rule is against it, though it has wide attestation.

7 Marshall 1978: 114, very clear on this point, argues for a Palestinian setting. That is as far as he goes.

9 So ℵ, A, B, L, Byz; so read most translations. Schürmann 1969: 121 n. 180 and Marshall 1978: 116 discuss this textual problem.

23 Marshall 1978: 120. Bovon 1989: 144 notes conceptual parallels in Ps. 31:19 [31:20 MT; 30:19 LXX] and Isa. 64:4–5 [64:3–4 MT]. Nolland 1989: 120 cites Bar. 4:24 and sees Isa. 52:10 as the key point of connection. Goulder 1989: 257 sees Isa. 40:1–5 as the key text.

29 Schweizer 1984: 57; Marshall 1978: 122. Jeremias in his earlier TDNT article, 4:271–72, 276–77, stresses that the dividing point is the presence or absence of faith.

33 John 19:25–27; Godet 1875: 1.141; Hendriksen 1978: 170–71; Marshall 1978: 123. Nolland 1989: 122 cites Ps. 22:20 [22:21 MT]; 37:15; Zech. 12:10; 13:7; and Ps. 37:15 as conceptual background.

1 The view is old. Those who hold it include Bultmann 1963: 300; Creed 1930: 44; Klostermann 1929: 45; Schürmann 1969: 139; Schneider 1977a: 76; Wiefel 1988: 82; and Fitzmyer 1981: 435–36. About the only one who raises doubts is Marshall 1978: 126. Despite the remarks about sources, Coleridge 1993: 187–213 is certainly correct that from a narrative viewpoint this pericope could not be dropped without substantial loss to the infancy narrative. Jesus' remarks about himself are a fitting climax to the prologue. In Coleridge's words (p. 189), this unit is "the most important" of the infancy narrative.

5 Marshall 1978: 125–26. One can only note the restraint in this account compared to the apocryphal gospels. In contrast, the Jesus Seminar puts Jesus' saying in 2:49 in black type (meaning that it does not go back to Jesus); Funk and Hoover 1993: 275–76. They see the unit as Luke's production, drawing on the child-prodigy genre, the Lucan emphasis on design, and its lack of attestation elsewhere. But these criteria ignore the potential of a unique source surfacing in Luke's research and the evidence for the unit's origins in Palestinian settings (see the discussion above and n. 3). Its enigmatic expression also reflects Jesus' style (see also Nolland 1989: 127–28, who speaks less directly on the issue of historicity in 2:49). That this is the only use of δεῖ relating Jesus to the Father speaks against a Lucan origin. On the historicity of the entire scene, see the exegesis of 2:50.

12 Marshall 1978: 127; R. Brown 1977: 474; Jeremias 1969: 58–60; Josephus, Life 52 §269; m. Maʿas. Š. 5.2.

1 Marshall 1978: 131 defends a break in Luke's Gospel before 4:14 by noting that Jesus' ministry really begins at this verse. Schürmann 1969: 146–48 sees the break at 4:44.

1 So Marshall 1978: 132; Marshall 1970: 145–46; Bovon 1989: 165 (who sees John as a "bridge" figure); Wink 1968: 42–86. Other Lucan texts on the Baptist are Luke 7:18–35; Acts 1:5, 22; 10:37; 11:16; 13:24–25; 19:3–4.

12 Against this view is Schürmann 1969: 155; in favor of a wide-ranging minstry is Marshall 1978: 135. The reference to the entire region suggests that Marshall is correct.

5 It is possible that Luke described the dialogue in 3:12–14 with his own words, but the call for concrete repentance fits the work of a prophet. Ernst 1977: 143 argues that the question-and-answer style and the theme of care for fellow humans are like Luke. However, more likely is that the material has a traditional base, since the style is not as Lucan as Ernst suggests. So correctly argues Schürmann 1969: 169 n. 53, who with Marshall 1978: 142 notes numerous peculiarities that Luke does not have elsewhere. The Semitisms in 3:7–9 suggest the age of the material; see the exegesis of 3:8–9 for details.

8 Luke uses the singular form of ὄχλος twenty-five times and the plural sixteen times in his Gospel; in Acts, the singular occurs fifteen times and the plural seven times; Marshall 1978: 138; Fitzmyer 1981: 467. Schulz 1972: 366 n. 285 is confident the change is Luke's because of his usage of this term.

13 Marshall 1978: 140; Luke 7:39, 49; 16:3; 18:4; Black 1967: 302. Manson 1949: 40 notes that the Semitism is reflected in Luke's wording, while Matthew has a more stylized Greek. The verb ἄρχω occurs in the middle voice, ἄρχομαι, meaning "to begin," thirty-one times in Luke and thirteen times in Matthew.

16 Marshall 1978: 141; Black 1967: 144–45 (who notes other traces of Semitisms in Matthew).

2 Marshall 1978: 146 compares its position to that of ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ πυρί later in the verse. There is a balance here. The reference to water comes early, while the reference to the Spirit trails in its clause. Both are emphatic and the distinction marks a clear contrast not only in content but in presentation.

7 Marshall 1978: 147; Scobie 1964: 73 n. 1. As Nolland 1989: 152 says, the argument "proves too much." Acts 19 shows people whose tie to Spirit hope is remote, not intimate.

10 Though this is its only use in Luke, the construction occurs twenty-seven times in Acts; BDF §451.1; BDR §451.1.3; Marshall 1978: 149.

2 See BAGD 691 §2c; BAA 1386 §2c; Gen. 6:5; Matt. 9:4; Mark 7:23. Grammatically the plural ὦν is attracted to πονηρῶν, while it refers back to πάντων; BDF §294.5; Marshall 1978: 149.

19 Hendriksen 1978: 218 (who alludes to eternal generation); Geldenhuys 1951: 147; Marshall 1978: 155–56 (who more cautiously speaks only of a more than Messiah perspective, while refusing to emphasize ontology as such).

20 Marshall 1978: 155–56 links the two positions together unnecessarily. One can distinguish between how Jesus saw himself and how a Gospel writer chose to reveal that understanding. For example, 2:41–52 shows hints of the deeper view of Jesus, but it is not explained until late in the Gospel and in Acts.

6 For defense of a Marian genealogy, see Hendriksen 1978: 222–25. Marshall 1978: 162 gives the grammatical refutation of the notion that the reference to Joseph is parenthetical, which would make the genealogy Mary's.

8 Marshall 1978: 162–65 also has a detailed presentation of this material. In the following discussion, I do not transliterate the Greek names because in almost every case the English name is the same as the transliteration. The only differences involve case endings or transliterations that are drawn from the Hebrew.

36 Marshall 1978: 173 notes the options. Schulz 1972: 180 argues that Matthew is secondary.

11 Schramm 1971: 37; Marshall 1978: 179. Ernst 1977: 168–69 sees Luke's hand in many but not all changes. Bovon 1989: 207–8 sees an additional source beyond Mark, either Q or special Lucan material, and despairs of being able to sort out what came from where, beyond the basic elements in 4:18–22 and 4:25–27 originating in the additional source. Crossan 1991 fails to discuss this text, a significant omission in a life-of-Jesus study. This omission may well suggest that Crossan regards none of it as going back to Jesus.

16 Schürmann 1969: 228; Ellis 1974: 96; Marshall 1978: 181. For the wording of the Shemoneh Esreh, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–61.

33 Jeremias 1958: 44–46; Marshall 1978: 185–86, who notes (though leaning to this view) that the next is also possible.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

39 O'Neill 1959; Luke 4:24; 12:37; 18:17, 29; 21:32; 23:43. On the authenticity of these statements, see Marshall 1978: 187–88. Ἀμήν, transliterated from אָמֵן (ʾāmēn), means "let it be so."

42 For εἰ μή (in this context: adversative "but"), see Klostermann 1929: 65; Marshall 1978: 189; BDF §448.8.

13 Foerster, TDNT 2:8–9. Marshall 1978: 193 notes this contrasts to Jesus, the Holy One, in 4:34.

26 Danker 1988: 112 (who calls it a demonic effect); Marshall 1978: 195; Creed 1930: 71; Nolland 1989: 211–12 (who speaks of the presence of "demonic force" as opposed to possession). On the idea of rebuke, see Luke 9:21, 42, 55 (other Lucan uses of ἐπιτιμάω are 4:41; 17:3; 18:15, 39; 19:39; 23:40).

33 Marshall 1978: 197; Ernst 1977: 182; Hendriksen 1978: 269–70. See the exegesis of 4:35a for fuller discussion. Other demonic confessions are Mark 1:24; 3:11; 5:7; Luke 4:34; 8:28; Acts 16:17; 19:15; Matt. 8:29; Friedrich, TDNT 3:708; Grundmann, TDNT 3:900 §B1.

6 So hold most scholars. For discussion, see Schneider 1977a: 122–23; Marshall 1978: 199; Fitzmyer 1981: 561 (who speaks of L, where the postresurrection tradition was already moved back; Luke simply used L and joined it to Marcan material); Ernst 1977: 184–85 (who goes on to say that Luke is not merely embellishing Mark); Van Der Loos 1965: 670; Schramm 1971: 37–40 (who sees mostly Marcan material); Dietrich 1972: 25–38 (who explains why Mark alone cannot be the source).

20 For Luke's normal way of naming Peter ("Simon … called/named Peter"), see Luke 6:14; Acts 10:5, 18, 32; 11:13. On the text-critical problem that this unique wording produces, see Marshall 1978: 204. A few manuscripts (e.g., D, W, family 13) omit Πέτρος. The uniqueness of the phrase speaks to its originality.

29 If so, the less natural lexical meaning is not necessary; Marshall 1978: 213; Kelso 1962: 544; Van Der Loos 1965: 441 n. 3.

9 For a defense of the authenticity of Mark 2:18–20, and thus of its parallels, see V. Taylor 1966: 208–12 (who argues that the Marcan tradition has roots in an eyewitness and was told to reveal Jesus' mind about fasting); Cranfield 1959: 107–11; Marshall 1978: 223 (though he regards it as possible that Luke 5:36–39 may be a separate tradition). Bovon 1989: 256 also sees a distinct tradition, since Luke's saying has a parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 47, though in a different order (Luke: garment [5:36], then wine [5:37–39]; Thomas: the reverse). Teaching through word linkage was popular in Judaism. When done with the Scriptures, it was called gezerah shewah.

16 For this view are Schürmann 1969: 296; Hendriksen 1978: 309; Wiefel 1988: 121 (perhaps). Against it is Marshall 1978: 226. Bovon 1989: 261 thinks that any specific allusion to the cross or ascension is unlikely and prefers to refer only to the period of the church. The key terms are ἀπαρθῇ in Luke and two forms of αἴρω in Isa. 53.

18 Such metaphors are often called "similitudes"; Hauck, TDNT 5:753; Marshall 1978: 226.

19 Danker 1988: 128–29 and Luce 1933: 136 overdraw the difference. Marshall 1978: 227 is more balanced.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

43 Among those who support this approach are Schürmann 1969: 302; Vogt 1959; Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; and apparently Danker 1988: 130. Marshall 1978: 230 is uncertain of the origin.

44 For more recent discussion, see Käser 1968; Schürmann 1969: 304 n. 29; Marshall 1978: 233; Fitzmyer 1981: 610 (who ties it to the apocryphal gospel tradition); Wiefel 1988: 123 (who rejects a connection to Jesus); and Bovon 1989: 267.

3 Marshall 1978: 237 notes that Luke may have had an alternate list of the Twelve, but he regards the evidence as weak. Schürmann 1969: 318–19, 323 is confident that Luke had a form of what he calls the "Catalogue of the Apostles" (a name that notes the passage's form), which differed from Mark and derived from Q. Bovon 1989: 278 also sees additional source material here beyond Mark, since the apostolic list had various forms, as Acts 1:13 shows. Nolland 1989: 265 speaks only of the influences of another tradition. Though he is less certain of another full list used by Luke, he thinks one existed because of the inclusion of Judas son of James and the absence of Thaddaeus. The differences in the lists will be noted in the exegesis.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif.

Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

3 Even Marshall 1978: 247, who is more hesitant than most to recognize additions in the tradition, seems to allow that the woes may be an early church commentary added to the tradition; he calls the arguments for an addition stronger, but without arguing that it is the case.

11 The closest possibility is the comparison with the priesthood in Hebrews, but here only Jesus is noted. Ellis 1974: 112 accepts the Mosaic imagery but not the Aaronic; Marshall 1978: 241 regards the Mosaic picture as possible; Nolland 1989: 275 argues persuasively against it. Nolland notes that the OT texts are a call to keep people away from the mountain (e.g., Exod. 19:12) and that the OT mountain setting is not related to teaching.

14 Hendriksen 1978: 334 argues for this locale; Marshall 1978: 241–42 calls it possible. Davies and Allison 1988: 422 mention Karn Hattin (Horns of Hattin) as another suggestion, but they prefer not to adopt a specific location, since for them the Matthean sermon is a collected representative sermon, as opposed to a sermon in a single place (see excursus 7 for details). Edersheim 1889: 1.524 argues against Karn Hattin.

18 Fitzmyer 1981: 624, Schürmann 1969: 322, and Bovon 1989: 286 are certain about the Gentile allusion (Luke 2:31–32; 3:6; 4:25–29). Ernst 1977: 212, Marshall 1978: 242, and Tiede 1988: 136 are more cautious.

29 Marshall 1978: 252; Schürmann 1969: 335–36. Jeremias 1971a: 239–40 notes that these warnings of persecution occur in every strand of Gospel tradition, showing their widespread presence and association to Jesus. Schürmann notes conceptual Lucan parallels in 11:49–52 and 12:11–12.

They sound like Matt. 5:11. For a pre-Easter setting, he notes Matt. 10:28–31, 34–39; Mark 6:14–29; 11:1–11, 15–18 as giving evidence of pre-Easter tension.

35 Marshall 1978: 258, however, sees a shift of audience from outsiders to insiders in this verse; so also Ernst 1977: 224. But see T. Schmidt 1987: 141.

40 Danker 1988: 145 still sees this background in Luke. Marshall 1978: 261 holds out the possibility of separate sayings.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

50 BAGD 83–84; BAA 167; Godet 1875: 1.326; Creed 1930: 95; Marshall 1978: 264; Fitzmyer 1981: 640; Schürmann 1969: 355 n. 90; Bultmann, TDNT 2:533–34.

63 On these plants and the various fruits, see Marshall 1978: 273; Barn. 7.11; Matt. 7:16; Mark 11:13; 12:26; Luke 20:37; Acts 7:30, 35; James 3:12; Rev. 14:18.

68 Guelich 1982: 412, 404; Marshall 1978: 275; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:603. For βροχή (only in Matt. 7:25, 27 in the NT), see BAGD 147 and BAA 294.

72 The high number of hapax legomena in Luke 6:47–49 suggests the presence of a source. See also Marshall 1978: 274.

10 Marshall 1978: 281 notes four expressions that are frequent in Luke: διό, ἐμαυτοῦ, ἀξιόω, and ἔρχομαι πρός.

9 Marshall 1978: 285 notes that Luke 19:34; 22:61; and 24:3 are not exceptions to this observation, though he also notes that the final decision is still open; Creed 1930: 104. Hahn 1969: 81–82 argues that Luke, though introducing the title himself, reflects traditional usage.

6 For Q as the basic source, see Schürmann 1969: 413, 418; Marshall 1978: 287; Fitzmyer 1981: 662–63; Tiede 1988: 153; Wiefel 1988: 148; Bovon 1989: 369. Those who prefer Matthean priority argue that Luke used Matthew. Luke 7:20–21, 29–30 does not have a parallel in Matthew.

8 Schürmann 1969: 408 n. 8, 409 argues that John's question speaks of kingdom hope in general. John's question was, "Do you bring the kingdom and the promise of God?" This may be a correct way to view the question's force, but behind it must lie a messianic implication, when the other options are rejected. This may be why Marshall 1978: 290 speaks of a vague messianic expectation. Wiefel 1988: 149 notes two options for "Coming One": an allusion to Dan. 7:13 [Theodotion] with its apocalyptic judge or to Hab. 2:3, which at Qumran was used with apocalyptic, eschatological force. On Hab. 2:3, see Strobel 1961b: 265–77.

12 For a figurative force are Fitzmyer 1981: 671, 673–74; Hendriksen 1978: 395–96; Arndt 1956: 212; Marshall 1978: 294; Ernst 1977: 250; Schürmann 1969: 416 n. 53 (who mentions that such a reed, Phragmites communis, could grow to a height of sixteen feet).

16 Matt. 11:10 agrees exactly with Luke except that ἐγώ precedes the initial verb in the verse; Mark 1:2 agrees exactly with Luke except that the final phrase (ἔμπροσθέν σου) is missing. Marshall 1978: 295 suggests that Mal. 3:1 was linked early on in Judaism (via gezerah shewah) to Isa. 40:3 by their common use of פָּנָה (pānâ, to prepare).

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

8 Jeremias 1963a: 126, 132 opts for either a prostitute or a woman in a dishonorable vocation, by which he means either an immoral or a dishonest vocation; Jeremias 1969: 303–12; Fitzmyer 1981: 689; Black 1967: 181–83. Marshall 1978: 308 notes correctly that the sins seem to be hers, so that her reputation is not because of association with someone else; so also Wiefel 1988: 154, who thinks she is a prostitute, as does Schürmann 1969: 431 n. 8.

16 Fitzmyer 1981: 690 and Marshall 1978: 311 mention that no specific verb for “to thank” exists in Aramaic or Hebrew. Thus, the sense of ἀγαπάω is something like that in Ps. 116:1 [114:1 LXX] or Josephus, Jewish War 1.10.2 §198. See Wood 1954–55 and Jeremias 1963a: 126–27. Fitzmyer adds that in 1QH the Hebrew verb for praise (הוֹדָה, hôdâ) is constantly used to express thanks. What is present is gratitude that also expresses appreciation and love.

11 On seven as denoting severe possession, see Marshall 1978: 316; Rengstorf, TDNT 2:630–31; cf. Mark 5:9.

13 BAGD 303; BAA 615; LSJ 669; Josephus, Jewish War 1.24.6 §487; Antiquities 18.6.6 §194; SB 2:164; Marshall 1978: 317; Fitzmyer 1981: 698; Hoehner 1972: 120, 303–5, 317 n. 4.

9 On the relationship of Luke to Mark, see Marshall 1978: 318. The differences in wording show interpretive paraphrasing by the evangelists in this material, but it is in line with Jesus' original teaching and authentically reflects his teaching. For major arguments defending the authenticity, see P. Payne 1980.

21 Matthew stresses why Jesus taught the crowd with parables, while Mark just notes that the question was about parables and adds specifically that the conversation was given in private. The difference with Luke is easy to explain, since Matt. 13 = Mark 4 has multiple parables; Marshall 1978: 321.

31 Also for authenticity is Marshall 1978: 321. Fitzmyer 1981: 706–7 accepts the assertion as coming from Jesus but not its placement in this setting. For more on the relationship between the Isaiah Targum and the NT, especially Mark, see the additional note. For more on authenticity, see the discussion of sources and historicity in this unit.

34 Marshall 1969 notes that the many Lucan touches in the parable do not alter its basic meaning. See the additional note for more defense of the parable's authenticity and a critique of Jeremias's position.

35 Marshall 1978: 324 and Fitzmyer 1981: 713 take the pronoun in the phrase ἔστιν … αὕτη as a predicate, yielding, "The parable means this. …" Bovon 1989: 407 n. 21 prefers a reference back to 8:9 and translates, "This parable is. …" There is little difference in the options. Bovon also notes that this use of the verb recalls Jewish usage, where apocalyptic visions are interpreted. He cites Klauck 1978: 88 n. 273 for details.

37 Creed 1930: 116 notes that Luke uses both σατανᾶς and διάβολος. In fact, Luke uses each term seven times in Luke–Acts; Bovon 1989: 408 n. 32. It is hard to explain this difference as a conscious change because of stylistic preference; so correctly Marshall 1978: 325.

39 So Ernst 1977: 269. Some see a Paulinist touch here. Plummer 1896: 220 suggests that the Lucan conclusion in 8:12 may go back to Paul; Arndt 1956: 230. Others suggest that Luke is using church terminology to make clear what Jesus means, a point that seems likely; Marshall 1978: 325; Fitzmyer 1981: 713.

3 Παραγίνομαι is probably Lucan: twenty-eight times in Luke–Acts, nine times in rest of NT, with three of these being in Matthew and one in Mark. The singular form of the verb reflects occasional Greek style in agreeing with the first subject; BDF §135.1a; BDR §135.1a; Marshall 1978: 331; Luke 8:22; Acts 11:14.

4 So also Danker 1988: 179 (with a little hesitancy); Ellis 1974: 127. Fitzmyer 1981: 725 rightly rejects this view, as do Schürmann 1969: 470 n. 197; Marshall 1978: 332; and Wiefel 1988: 162.

1 This miracle cluster is paralleled in Mark 4:35–5:43; Marshall 1978: 332–33; Fitzmyer 1981: 726–27; Tiede 1988: 170; Wiefel 1988: 163 n. 1.

6 Theissen 1983: 100 notes Greek parallels in ancient novels. In Greek circles, the rescue involves the appearing of a god; Homer, Hymns 33.12; Aristides, Hymn to Serapis 33. Such rescues are the affairs of divinity. Marshall 1978: 333 notes a parallel to Virgil, Aeneid 4.554–60.

5 Arndt 1956: 238 puts all of these events on the same day, while Marshall 1978: 335 suggests an allusion to Ps. 65:7 [65:8 MT] and the “tumult of the people,” though the verbal connection is vague. C. F. Evans 1990: 383 notes Ps. 65:5–8 [65:6–9 MT]; 46:2–6 [46:3–7 MT]; Isa. 17:12–13, which are less than evident. Matt. 8–9 is topically arranged.

6 That Matthew may have accompanied Jesus lends credence to the added detail of the second demoniac. The extent of the agreement between Mark and Luke leads most to see Mark as the source for Luke; so Schürmann 1969: 487; Schramm 1971: 90; Marshall 1978: 335; Fitzmyer 1981: 733; Wiefel 1988: 165–66. Bovon 1989: 432 is so impressed with these agreements that he argues that this account stands against the two-Gospel (or Griesbach) hypothesis. What could have caused Luke to go his own way against Matthew?

31 Josephus, Life 9 §42, describes Gadara as located “on the frontiers of Tiberias.” Some of its coins include a ship; Marshall 1978: 337.

23 Marshall 1978: 346 notes the Lucan terminology in 8:47: the use of the preposition διά with αἰτία (as in Acts 10:21; 22:24; 28:18, 20) and the use of ἐνώπιον with πᾶς (as in Luke 14:10; Acts 6:5; 19:19; 27:35).

24 Marshall 1978: 342 suggests that the scornful Jews of 8:54–56 were not worthy recipients of the report on the resuscitation.

33 Plummer 1896: 235; Marshall 1978: 344; Fitzmyer 1981: 746; Bovon 1989: 445–46 (who argues that Luke may be responsible for it); Creed 1930: 123; and Hendriksen 1978: 466 appear undecided. Arndt 1956: 246 and A. B. Bruce 1897: 525 are for inclusion. Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 137; Ellis 1974: 130; and Luce 1933: 173 omit it.

4 Fitzmyer 1981: 753 is too cautious here. Marshall 1978: 350 is correct in calling it “one of the best-attested facts in the life of Jesus,” following Manson 1949: 73; also V. Taylor 1966: 302. This tradition contains one of the few sayings of Jesus alluded to by Paul (1 Cor. 9:14).

16 On κονιορτός (dust), see BAGD 443; BAA 900; Luke 10:11; Acts 13:51; 18:6. On ἐκτινάσσω (to shake off), the verb used in the parallel Mark 6:11 = Matt. 10:14, see BAGD 246; BAA 496; Strathmann, TDNT 4:503. Even though the tense of the Marcan verb is aorist and the Lucan verb is present (Marshall 1978: 354), there is no difference in sense.

10 The latter option is expressed as the protasis of a conditional sentence, as is seen by the use of the subjunctive ἀγοράσωμεν with εἰ μήτι: "unless we should go buy"; Marshall 1978: 360; BDF §376.

3 Dinkler 1971 defends only Peter's confession and the Satan saying (Mark 8:33 = Matt. 16:23) as authentic. Marshall 1978: 365 correctly accepts the whole unit.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked

Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

1 Marshall distinguishes these oral sources from the presence of another written source, which is Schramm's view; 1971: 130–31.

3 Bayer 1986: 193–94. Appealing to possible oral tradition, Marshall 1978: 394 more cautiously notes that μέλλει reflects an Aramaic participle and thus perhaps the saying's ancient form. Colpe, TDNT 8:444, speaks of a possible "unabbreviated special tradition," though he also sees the church developing this tradition. Fitzmyer 1981: 812 sees Luke's dependence only on Mark, though he has trouble explaining Luke's abbreviated prediction. Bayer 1986: 197 makes a good case against the Lucan short form as the original form, arguing that Luke has abbreviated the tradition. Against a second source is Nolland 1993a: 512.

4 Note the passive progressive construction: ἦν παρακεκαλυμμένον (was being hidden). Marshall 1978: 394 notes that this construction with ἀπό (from) is a Hebraism; Ezek. 22:26; BDF §155.3. Citing Exod. 7:13–14 ("Pharaoh's heart was hardened"), Tiede 1988: 193 argues that the passive is ambiguous about the concealer's identity. Such remarks are usually tied to God's sovereignty (1 Cor. 1:30; 2:6–9). Regardless, the implication is that such concealment can be overturned only by attention to God's message. Nolland 1993a: 514 holds out the possibility of Satanic binding, noting that by 24:25 the disciples are seen as responsible for failing to understand. Nolland may be right.

1 So correctly Luce 1933: 193–94, who is not averse to claiming that sayings are nonhistorical, yet defends historicity here. Marshall 1978: 398 notes the OT conceptual parallel in Num. 11:24–30. To be rejected is Goulder's view (1989: 450) that Luke 9:49–50 is really a subtle defense of Paul before the apostles, a view that looks like F. C. Baur reborn. Goulder is right to reject the view that Jesus endorses non-Christian exorcists here. They cannot act in Jesus' name. Luke has in mind those who have responded to Jesus and have sought to minister for him. He encourages such involvement.

7 The concept of reception pictures the open welcome to be given to others. On δέξηται (he receives), see Marshall 1978: 396; Grundmann, TDNT 2:51–52. The term refers to friendly reception or hospitality, which was seen as sacred in the ancient world and in Judaism. B. Šab. 127a says, "Hospitality to travelers is greater than the greeting of the Shekinah." Though hyperbolic, the saying shows the importance of hospitality. Josephus, Jewish War 7.4.1 §63, refers to how Vespasian's reception brought joy and satisfaction.

4 Marshall 1978: 405 notes that the Hebrew idiom may suggest a source behind Luke's remarks. Appealing to Ezek. 6:2; 13:17; 15:7; 20:46 [21:2 MT], C. A. Evans 1987a argues that the force is "to dispatch," a view possible for the term but awkward for this context. In a reworking of this article in Evans and Sanders 1993: 93–105, Evans makes less of the lexical argument and argues for an allusion to Ezek. 21:2–6 [21:7–11 MT], with the implication that with the journey comes not only destined suffering for Jesus but also judgment for Israel (he also adds Ezek. 25:2; 28:21; 29:2; and 38:2, while emphasizing the parallel in 20:46 [21:2 MT]; p. 100). If so, then Jesus' act is like that of the prophet and has a place in the divine drama of Israel's history. This view is possible, but not certain. For a denial of judgment here, see Giblin 1985: 31–32.

9 Plummer 1896: 264 notes that Luke makes nothing of this nickname. Marshall 1978: 406 rejects the suggestion of the nickname's connection with this incident, noting that the name is absent and that it is not likely that Jesus would give them a derogatory nickname. In addition, Mark 3:17 does not say that the name came from Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 536 notes that the concern of James and John in Mark 10:35–45 also revolves around power. But disciples are to serve. The nickname may allude to their character, which is undergoing reformation.

1 Dibelius 1934: 160–61, esp. 160 n. 1, says that the general nature of the remark shows that it comes from the evangelist, but how "general principles" can come from the evangelist is not clear. It is the unique attestation of this saying in Luke that appears to be the only reason for this conclusion, along with its possible use of OT imagery from Gen. 19:26. The Jesus Seminar sees these verses as going back to Luke, claiming that the saying assumes too much self-identity for disciples (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316 prints it in black type). But the distinctive behavior and identity are already indicated in the first two sayings, which the seminar accepts. On the rejection of other attempts to argue that the early church is responsible for the sayings, see Marshall 1978: 409, in particular his evaluation of Schulz

1972: 435 n. 239, who relies on Dibelius. Glombitza 1971 also makes a case for Lucan creation.

7 Fitzmyer 1985: 859 sees the material as a Lucan creation, but coming from an authentic saying reflected in a variant form in 10:18. Such a distinction is not necessary. Marshall 1978: 427–28 notes the options: a Lucan creation, the Q source, or a special Lucan source. He opts for Q and notes that the subunit's historicity is tied to how one views the mission's historicity as a whole.

8 Fitzmyer 1985: 865 sees Luke joining this material together in a new context, as does Marshall 1978: 431–32, who notes the various options and argues that both sayings go back to Jesus.

30 Schweizer 1984: 176 notes that the force is spatial. Marshall 1978: 422 notes that in 11:20, which uses a different term, φθάνω, Luke clearly means "arrived." On the relationship between ἐγγίζω and φθάνω, see Fitzer, TDNT 9:89, esp. n. 10. Does 10:9 say the same thing as 11:20? It most likely does. Marshall does not think the spatial argument is as key as the argument of 11:20. For a full defense of the kingdom declared as arrived in this verse, see Bock 1992c. For the debate over the Aramaic behind the sayings and the difficulty of determining it, see Meier 1994: 432–34, 486–87. Luke's ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (upon you) is missing in the Matthean parallel and may represent his explanation of the sayings' force. The present effects of the kingdom are clearly in view (10:23–24; Nolland 1993a: 554). Schürmann 1994: 74 cites 7:28; 16:16; and 17:20–21 as conceptually parallel.

31 Here ὑμῖν is a good example of a dative of disadvantage: "against you." Marshall 1978: 423 and Grundmann 1963: 210 note that this is true—unless the town repents. The declaration is not decisive, but it indicates where the town is headed. The danger of refusal now is that there will be refusal later. For more on “shaking dust,” see Cadbury 1933: 269–71.

46 Marshall 1978: 430 notes that the rhetorical remark is not a denial or a rebuke about their joy over their authority; it is a comparative idea. Knowing God, or better, being known by him, is a more important source of joy; Zerwick 1963: §445.

54 Such efforts, beginning with Harnack, regard this verse as too harsh a literary transition. This view appeals to the church fathers, who often cite the phrase and reverse the position of the Son and Father. Creed 1930: 147–48 rightly rejects such attempts because they are without strong external textual support; see also Schweizer, TDNT 8:372 n. 276. Marshall 1978: 435 notes that Marcion and codex N reverse the expression in Luke, while Justin Martyr and codex N reverse it in Matthew; for more reversal passages in the fathers, see Grundmann 1963: 218 n. 16.

60 Marshall sees an allusion to the nations in the wolves of 10:3, but if so the allusion is negative, which does not reinforce the universal element alleged as present here; Jellicoe 1959–60.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses’ addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 (“leans” this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977:

331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

3 Many explain the difference in the Lucan form of the question (eternal life) versus that in the other Synoptics (greatest commandment) as a Lucan rewording that highlighted the real issue; Marshall 1978: 440–41.

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

5 Marshall 1978: 455 sees either two versions or Matthew's adding to an original short edition like that in Luke. These reflect distinct recensions of Q; but he does not discuss the number of events. Jeremias 1971a: 193–96 argues for the originality of the Lucan form and posits an Aramaic form behind it. He regards its structure as memorable in an oral context, carrying rhyme and a two-four rhythm (so also Meier 1994: 293). Beasley-Murray 1986: 147 argues that Luke's version is original in extent, but that Matthew's is closer to the original wording, a view close to Nolland's (noted above). For him Luke's prayer circulated in Gentile Christian circles, while Matthew's was the Jewish-Christian version. Nevertheless, for him the prayer's roots go back to Jesus. Wiefel 1988: 215 is less certain of this attempt to distinguish communities.

8 Without discussing the settings, Marshall 1978: 466 speaks only of different versions of the teaching having reached Matthew and Luke.

17 A similar metonymic meaning for ἄρτος as food, not just bread, is found in Luke 7:33; John 13:18; 2 Thess. 3:8, 12; Marshall 1978: 458; Behm, TDNT 1:477–78.

23 Marshall 1978: 461 notes that the asking of forgiveness is conditional, meaning that the request for forgiveness assumes that the disciple is ready to be forgiving, while God's granting of forgiveness is a work of his grace (cf. Matt. 18:21–35).

25 Marshall argues for a causative force here ("cause us not to succumb to temptation") citing 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.8 as reflecting the Hebrew idiom. So also Talbert 1982: 130, citing Luke 4:13; 22:28; Acts 14:22; 20:19 as illustrations of this kind of request.

33 The viewpoint is that of the neighbor concerning the friend who makes the request. It is their mutual friendship that is in view; Marshall 1978: 465.

37 Marshall 1978: 496 notes five explanations offered for the Matthean-Lucan difference and opts for each Gospel representing different strands of oral tradition; see also Foerster, TDNT 5:579–80.

38 Matt. 7:11 refers more broadly in another setting to good things, so there is no need to discuss which wording is original; but see Marshall 1978: 470 for options. James 1:5–8, 17 is conceptually parallel. For δόμα (gift), see Eph. 4:8 (where the Spirit is referred to as gift) and Phil. 4:17; Büchsel, TDNT 2:166.

1 In this view, a tighter connection is seen between Matthew and Luke than between Luke and Mark, and proponents tend to speak of Q tradition. If Q is the source, this is the only exorcism in Q, a point that, by its uniqueness, argues for authenticity. Marshall 1978: 471–72 sees the account reflecting several controversies and that reconstructing the tradition history must be speculative. Fitzmyer 1985: 918 discusses only 11:19 as possibly reflecting an early church setting. Detailed evidence for Matthew's and Luke's being closer to each other than to Mark comes from Easton 1913.

9 Though in this case the normal Greek form would be Βεελζεβούβ (Beelzebub); Marshall 1978: 473; BAGD 139; BAA 277–78.

10 Other unlikely options are “Master of the complaint,” “Lord of dung,” or “Baal, the Flame”; Fitzmyer 1985: 920; Godet 1875: 2.60; Marshall 1978: 473; and Ernst 1977: 374.

26 On the meaning of φθάνω, see above and Kümmel 1957: 107 n. 8; Ladd 1974b: 65–68; Dodd 1936–37; Marshall 1978: 476. On the verb in NT as “arrival,” see Rom. 9:31; Phil. 3:16; and esp. 1 Thess. 2:16, which has a similar present-future tension with its reference to the wrath of God having arrived and residing until the end.

34 Marshall 1978: 478 notes that the Lucan image is one of messianic war; Isa. 59:16–18; O. Betz 1957–58.

1 Marshall 1978: 491–93 sees different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 96 sees most of Matt. 23 coming from a special Matthean source. Ellis 1974: 170 and Schlatter 1960: 303–5 see a combination of Q and special Lucan material. But Wiefel 1988: 227 objects to this because of the material’s similarity to Matt. 23.

2 Egelkraut 1976: 93 n. 1 argues that the question of 11:38 does not match the answer of 11:39 and thus Luke created the introduction (but see the exegesis of 11:38). Taking 11:39 as indicating the original setting, Marshall 1978: 492 argues that it is Matthew who shifted to a Mark 12 setting. He argues that Luke does not conflate sources, while Matthew has many topical rearrangements; so also Godet 1875: 2.87.

10 Marshall 1978: 493–94 notes the custom to eat two meals daily: a mid-morning meal called ἄριστον (BAGD 106; BAA 214) and a mid-afternoon meal called δεῖπνον (BAGD 173; BAA 346; m. Šab. 16.2). On the Sabbath, three meals were served, but a Sabbath meal is not indicated here. John 21:12, 15 refers to an early meal with a verb related to ἄριστον, so it is clear that this is not an evening setting. Josephus, Life 54 §279, notes a Sabbath meal at the sixth hour, or midday.

23 Matt. 23:29–32 is a more comprehensive statement of this theme. Marshall 1978: 501 notes that the vast differences in wording look at two distinct recensions of Q, a statement I take to refer to two events.

25 Plummer 1896: 313 speaks of divine providence. Marshall 1978: 502–4 distinguishes between the view that sees God speaking in his wisdom and one that sees "divine wisdom" like that found in Prov. 8. But the views are very close, since Prov. 8 is a figurative reference.

1 Most argue for Q: Fitzmyer 1985: 953 (12:1 from L), 956 (12:2–9 from Q), 962–63 (12:10 from Q or Mark; 12:11–12 from Q); Ernst 1977: 392 (for 12:2–9); and Schneider 1977a: 277. Grundmann 1963: 252 says it is "probably" Q. Marshall 1978: 510 speaks of Q material conflated with Marcan elements and also argues that Q has various recensions and that Luke's version is slightly different from that of Matthew. Nolland 1993a: 675–76 sees Q for 12:2–9 and a mixture of Q and Mark for 12:10–12.

13 On the debate (among those who regard both sayings as reflecting a single tradition) as to which saying is original, see Marshall 1978: 514–16, who opts for two forms of Q.

16 Fitzmyer 1985: 966. 1 Cor. 2:7 has a different verb (λαλέω, to speak), while John 14:26 and 1 John 2:27 use διδάσκω (to teach). Marshall 1978:

520–21 defends the authenticity of the concept, citing Beasley-Murray 1970: 473–74.

2 Manson 1949: 270 (who argues that the connection to 12:1–12 is literary and that 12:13–21 is a self-contained unit inserted between two Q passages) and Schweizer 1984: 207. There is little evidence that Matthew knew of the parable and omitted it, despite what Marshall 1978: 522 suggests, citing Matt. 6:19–20, 25. Fitzmyer 1985: 968 correctly notes that Luke alone gives evidence of this account.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: “One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, ‘I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!’ he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies.” 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: “Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, ‘We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.’ / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse” (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

2 Marshall 1978: 527 notes that no clear reason for the difference can be given. But Fitzmyer 1985: 978 observes that Luke often uses the verb κατανοέω: Luke 6:41; 12:24, 27; 20:23; Acts 7:31–32; 11:6; 27:39.

4 Ps. 130:1 LXX [131:1 Engl.]; Josephus, Antiquities 16.4.6 §135; Marshall 1978: 529; Deissner, TDNT 4:630–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 980; BAGD 514; BAA 1041; P. Oxy. vol. 14 #1679 line 16 (where it is a term for “wrong”).

10 Manson 1949: 114 regards the material as coming from distinct sources, as does Grundmann 1963: 262, though they differ as to which sources and give no reasons. Marshall 1978: 531 argues for the same source, but the distinct wording is a difficulty for that view. Fitzmyer 1985: 981 argues that 12:33a is Lucan and cites 11:41 for support, but that verse is figurative for one’s life and is not similar enough to argue that Luke created this saying. In addition, Fitzmyer argues that Luke abridged Matthew’s saying, but this cannot explain entirely the distinct terminology. Wiefel 1988: 241 sees Q and special L material here that Luke combined to answer the point made in 12:21.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke’s special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

8 On watchfulness, see Mark 13:33–36; 1 Cor. 16:13; Col. 4:2; 1 Thess. 5:6, 10; 1 Pet. 5:8; Rev. 3:2–3; 16:15; Marshall 1978: 536.

14 Marshall 1978: 539–40 lists the options. He holds to Matthean omission, as does Manson 1949: 117–18. Klostermann 1929: 139 and Ellis 1974: 181 regard it as Lucan. On the assumption that one tradition is present, the influence of additional source material for Luke cannot be ruled out since there is additional material elsewhere in the unit. For defense of its authenticity, see the discussion of sources and historicity above.

15 On the syntax, see Marshall 1978: 540 and Black 1967: 118–19, who argue that the Greek structure reflects a Semitic idiom: "If there is a steward, … he will be blessed when.… "

22 The stereotyped pairing day and hour is common: Job 38:23; Dan. 12:13; Mark 13:32 = Matt. 24:36; 25:13; Rev. 9:15; Marshall 1978: 543. The NT references allude to the parousia.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

25 Note the possible views mentioned in the exegesis of 12:41. The Matthean parallel of the hypocrite is enlightening, since a "play-actor" is addressed by ὑποκριτής; BAGD 845; BAA 1684. The term may well be Matthew's rendering, since he uses it seven times uniquely (Schneider 1975: 26 n. 14; Nolland 1993a: 704). Marshall 1978: 544 notes that Aramaic הנפא (hnp,) can be translated with the sense that appears in each version of the account. On false teachers, see esp. 2 Pet. 2:1–2, 13–14, 17–22.

28 On the general nature of the remarks, see Seesemann, TDNT 5:173. Others have suggested specific groups: (1) church leaders and laity, (2) scribes and Jewish people, (3) Jews and Gentiles, and (4) believers and unbelievers. See Marshall 1978: 544 for a discussion of the first three options and Kistemaker 1980: 127 for the final option. It is too early for a direct reference to the church; so view 1 is unlikely (though the church is the audience to whom Luke applies the parable). There are no Gentiles in the audience, so view 3 is unlikely. A reference to scribes and Jewish people leaves out the most obvious group to be alluded to, that is, the disciples, so view 2 is not adequate either. Against a simple division into believers and unbelievers is the difference in tone between 12:46 and 12:47–48. Probably in view in 12:46 are those like Judas and those like the Jewish leadership who wait for the kingdom but ignore the master and beat his servants. The parable is relevant to Israelites because they perceive themselves as heirs of the kingdom. In addition, though they reject the idea, Jesus came as their king. His remarks show that they defaulted on their role by failing to serve.

5 This form of mission statement appears at Qumran; Marshall 1978: 546. 1QH has numerous claims by the Teacher of Righteousness about what God is doing through him. Jeremias 1971a: 293 and n. 6 defends the age of the key tradition in Mark 10:45, another example where multiple traditions are possible with Luke 22:27. As a controversial figure, such statements of purpose from Jesus were inevitable (see Grundmann 1963: 269 for a critique of Bultmann).

12 Τελέω suggests the completion of a destined course; Luke 2:39; 13:32; 22:37; Marshall 1978: 547.

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

16 The verbal complex ἔσονται … διαμεμερισμένοι (it shall be … divided) recalls the noun of 12:51; Fitzmyer 1985: 997; Marshall 1978: 548; N. Turner 1963: 89. This periphrastic construction is a future perfect that focuses on a state of division.

17 Νύμφη (lit., bride; BAGD 545 §2; BAA 1103 §2) in this context means “bride” to the mother-in-law (πενθερά; BAGD 642; BAA 1295), thus, daughter-in-law (Marshall 1978: 549; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1099).

22 Fitzmyer 1985: 1002 rejects the spiritual interpretation of 12:57–59, calling it allegorizing. Such a description says more about his seeing the material as derived from Q and reading it accordingly than it does about his literary sensitivity. There is no reason to regard this as a displaced saying about brotherly reconciliation (so Bultmann 1963: 172), since the contextual force is clear. Klostermann 1929: 141 errs in calling the accuser Satan (correctly refuted by Marshall 1978: 551).

4 Παρῆσαν (arrived), from πάρειμι (to arrive; BAGD 624 §1a; BAA 1261 §1), refers to the crowd’s arrival, not only its presence as many translations suggest; so correctly Plummer 1896: 337; Acts 10:21; 12:20; 17:6; 24:19, Marshall 1978: 553. In addition, ἀπαγγέλλω (to announce) usually refers to recent news; Marshall 1978: 553; Matt. 2:8; 28:8, 11; Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; Mark 16:10, 13; Luke 7:18; BAGD 79; BAA 157.

6 Comparative παρά may be a Semitism; Jeremias 1963a: 141; Luke 13:4; 18:14; BDF §236.3; BAGD 611 §III.3; BAA 1236 §III.3. The term πάντας must mean all other Galileans; Marshall 1978: 553; Fitzmyer 1985: 1007.

10 Marshall 1978: 554 argues that this detail shows the Semitic conceptual origins of the story.

13 Deut. 22:9; Judg. 9:7–15; 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; 2 Kings 18:31; SB 1:872–73 §g; Marshall 1978: 555. On fig trees and vineyards, see Pliny, Natural History 17.35 §200 and Nolland 1993a: 718. Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum 3.10.6, advises against mixing figs and vines.

17 Marshall 1978: 555 cites the refusal in Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 and the small yield in ›Abot de Rabbi Nathan A.16 (= Goldin 1955: 86).

5 Luke 5:15; 8:2; 11:14; 13:12; Matt. 8:17. Demonic influence may be a better description than demonic possession, because it is not behavior but a diseased condition that is the point; Luke 4:33, 38–39; 2 Cor. 12:7. Weakness is produced by the evil spirit; 1QapGen 20.17, 21–29; Stählin, TDNT 1:493; Marshall 1978: 557. Fitzmyer 1985: 1012 calls the genitival ἀσθενείας (weakness) an Aramaism; see Creed 1930: 183. Nolland 1993a: 724 suggests that the number eighteen may be conventional (2 x 9 = “a long time”); Judg. 3:13–14; 10:8; 20:25, 44; 2 Sam. 8:13. This is possible, but not certain.

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60;

Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

5 But so Schulz 1972: 301–9; rightly refuted by Marshall 1978: 559–60. Multiple levels of the parable tradition (see n. 1 above) teach the kingdom's gradual growth and contrastive transformation. In addition, even the parables of this section appear in various wings of the tradition (Mark and Q [or Matthew]), so that multiple attestation speaks for authenticity. Jeremias 1963a: 146 n. 68 notes the Palestinian coloring in the parables, a point in favor of authenticity. Even the Jesus Seminar accepts the essential authenticity of these parables, printing 13:18–19 in pink type and 13:20–21 in red (Funk and Hoover 1993: 346–47).

6 Jesus' introduction of the parable compares with rabbinic introductions of similar material; SB 2:7–9; note also Isa. 40:18; Marshall 1978: 561; Hauck, TDNT 5:753–54.

2 Marshall 1978: 563 also leans toward independence for the door imagery, though he sees elements of connection with the tradition in the rest of the passage and sees Luke bringing some elements of this material together. Fitzmyer 1985: 1021–22 sees a Lucan hand in most of the material and sees only 13:24–29 as Q material, though he acknowledges that the case is not certain. Nolland 1993a: 732 attributes 13:22–23 to Luke and the rest mainly to traditional roots, most shared with Matthew. Most argue that the theme of presence or entry of blessing brought the texts together (Meier 1994: 310) and that Luke rearranged 13:28–29 by placing what was at the end at the start of the saying. Meier 1994: 311 lists the Lucan order of Matthean elements as 9, 10, 4, 5, 6, 7, 2, 3, 5, with four Lucan redactional stichs. It is more credible, however, to see a fresh tradition, given all the restructuring required of the alternative.

6 The present participle οἱ σῳζόμενοι refers to those who are being delivered, but it looks to the future; Marshall 1978: 564; Isa. 37:32; 1 Enoch 102.7 [variant reading]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:66; Mark 10:26; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15.

12 Marshall 1978: 566 is right to suggest independence of Matthew and Luke at this point.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ›Abot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

22 Manson 1949: 125–26 notes that this saying rules out the idea of automatic blessing as a result of Abrahamic ancestry. The opposite idea is expressed in Ps. Sol. 9.9–10. Paul's attitude, as expressed in Rom. 9:4–6, is similar to Jesus' remark. Marshall 1978: 568 adds Mark 9:35; Luke 14:9–10; and 1 Cor. 4:9 as being similar in concept, as well as the remarks in Luke 1:51–53 and 3:8. One could also add Eph. 2:14–18, though here the idea of Jews being excluded is not prevalent. Rather Gentiles and Jews form a new community, where those who were far off and those who were near are equal. Paul, however, appears to believe that at some point in the future, Israelites will believe again en masse (Rom. 11:11–27, esp. 11:12, 15, 25–27), which may explain why only "some" are mentioned here as moving from first to last.

2 See Borg 1987: 162–63, 170, who notes Jer. 12:7 and Ezek. 11:22–23. So also Horsley 1987: 300–302, who calls Luke 13:32–33 part of a "fairly solid tradition" (p. 190). For the debate on 13:31–33, see Nolland 1993a: 738–39, who accepts 13:31–32, but regards 13:33 as a Lucan redaction that makes the transition from 13:32 to 13:34. However, the use of δεῖ is too widespread in the Gospel tradition to make this conclusion solid (see the exegesis of 13:33). In addition, as Marshall 1978: 570 suggests, 13:33 is an integral link to 13:32.

7 Marshall 1978: 572 and Thrall 1962: 20–21 interpret πλήν as “moreover.” BAGD 669 §1b and BAA 1346 §1b see it as contrastive, but in this context it is more of an emphatic explanation (§1c in the lexicons).

8 Although more complex and rhetorical, the Greek expression σήμερον καὶ αὔριον καὶ τῇ ἐχομένῃ resembles Semitic references to three days as a short period of time; Marshall 1978: 572; Ezra 8:32; Jdt. 12:7.

12 Bultmann 1963: 114 sees wisdom here. Leaney 1958: 210 cites Matt. 23:34; Luke 2:40, 52; 7:35; 11:31, 49 as parallels. See also 1 Enoch 42. Luke 11:49–51 uses the wisdom motif openly. For more reasons not to see wisdom here, see Bock 1987: 120. Marshall 1978: 573–74 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1034 opt for wisdom terminology, but without Jesus alluding to himself as wisdom, since Jesus sees himself as wisdom’s messenger. Sir. 24:7–12 provides a plausible background. If wisdom is in the background, this is the best way to argue for it. Nolland 1993a: 739 questions the presence of wisdom here, as do I.

14 For this reason Manson 1949: 127 rejects this view, which Ellis 1974: 191 accepts, citing Luke 11:51; 19:46; Acts 7:47. Marshall 1978: 576 notes that when a pronoun is attached to “house” in the sense of “temple,” the pronoun refers to God, which is not the case here, since the desolate house is Israel.

17 Tannehill 1986: 155–56 argues that Luke holds out hope for Israel’s future, citing Allison 1983: 75 as support. Allison argues that Jesus uses the standard Jewish form for giving a conditional prophecy; see also Allison 1985: 157. Marshall 1978: 577 leans this way.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1039 remarks that, even though Matt. 12:11 has a similar saying, the rest of the detail is too different to be attributed to Q. In fact, it is too difficult for any other shared tradition. Fitzmyer also correctly denies that Luke 6:9 is a doublet to this verse. Marshall 1978: 578 sees a Q connection as possible. Bultmann 1963: 12 and Lohse, TDNT 7:26, argue that the text was a variant tradition created from Mark 3:1–6, but Ernst 1977: 435 correctly notes that the distinct terminology and motives suggest too much distance for this connection; so also Meier 1994: 710.

4 Josephus, Life 5 §21, mentions the position of chief priests. Marshall 1978: 578 notes this reference, but is undecided on what it means.

2 As Marshall 1978: 584 notes, the reference to resurrection at the end adds an eschatological umbrella to the passage alluding to the resurrection of the just (cf. 2 Macc. 7:9; Luke 20:35; John 5:29).

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

6 See the introduction to this unit. Klostermann 1929: 151 sees Luke reducing the servants to one, while Marshall 1978: 588 prefers to see Matthew expanding the image.

7 Jewish excuses in other contexts include Deut. 20:5–7; 24:5; m. Soṭa 8.1–6. Marshall 1978: 588–89 correctly argues that Luke's concern about excessive attachment to possessions or family is present. Unfortunately, material concerns are dominant.

16 For the view that this is still a part of the parable, see Plummer 1896: 363, who incorrectly argues that the final remark here is not like others where Jesus is clearly marked out as speaking. Marshall 1978: 590–91 argues that the host is speaking but is pictured as the Lord. Another "hidden" parabolic application appears in 16:8b–13.

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

7 Marshall notes that Levi's devotion to Torah is expressed in terms of a similar commitment in Deut. 33:9 and 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 15–16. Schrenk, TDNT 5:983, defines μισέω as "to set aside for."

24 The verb μωρανθῇ literally means for salt “to become foolish,” a personification that shows its total lack of value because it is no longer salty; BAGD 531 §2; BAA 1075 §2. There may be a wordplay on the Semitic תפל (tpl), which can mean “to be foolish” or “to be unsavory”; Job 1:22; Jer. 23:13; Marshall 1978: 595; Black 1967: 166; Schwarz 1978. Nolland 1993a: 765 notes that the figure is based on the result of salt losing its saltiness, regardless of whether it actually happens.

8 Παραβολήν (parable) is singular, as in 5:36, where it also referred to more than one parable. Marshall 1978: 600 suggests that it means “a parabolic discourse.”

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

3 For effective refutation, see O’Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O’Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the

“lostness” of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

10 Rengstorf 1967 suggests as allusion to the Jewish custom of qēṣ;āṣ;â (קְצָצָה), which cut off from society a member who sold a family heirloom to an outsider or who married beneath their social rank (Jastrow 1903: 1407–8). There is no indication that such a custom applies here, though Rengstorf’s study does show the parable’s social context and background in terms of the familial symbolism of the ring and robe in 15:22. For refutation, see Marshall 1978: 606 and Bailey 1976: 167–68.

15 Κεράτιον (little horn) was eaten only by the poorest humans; BAGD 429; BAA 873; a NT hapax legomenon. Marshall 1978: 609 cites a saying from Lev. Rab. 35.6 on 26:3: “When the Israelites are reduced to carob pods, then they repent.” This food was nicknamed “John the Baptist’s bread,” on the erroneous idea that John ate carobs. John’s carob was sweet, while this carob was bitter; Nolland 1993a: 783; Bailey 1976: 171–73.

25 So the passive εὐφραίνω (to rejoice); BAGD 327 §2; BAA 663 §2; Luke 12:19; 16:19; Acts 2:26; 7:41; Rom. 15:10; Gal. 4:27. Used in other passages for eschatological joy, here its meaning is more mundane. The participle φαγόντες (eating) functions like a second verb (BDF §420.3; Marshall 1978: 611): “Let us eat and rejoice.”

1 Marshall 1978: 614–17 has an excellent overview of the difficult issues in this parable. For a historical survey of the parable’s interpretation, see Krämer 1972; Ireland 1992: 5–47; and Ireland 1989.

3 So, e.g., Jeremias 1963a: 45–48. Marshall 1978: 622–23 notes that even if, as he believes, this is a compilation, the teaching still comes from traditional material. Since he defends the authenticity of 16:13, this seems to imply the authenticity of the whole of 16:9–13. Pilgrim 1981: 127, however, alludes to the work of a Christian preacher or teacher. Talbert 1982: 153 is probably incorrect to call 16:8b an initial interpretation of the parable, since it is really an observation that produces an application only by implication. The phrase but I say to you in 16:9 is the start of the parable's formal application and is not a Lucan expression (Jeremias 1980: 106).

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1100 says that the question serves to advance the story, but it does more than that because of the question's psychological value. Marshall 1978: 618 notes that the typical procedure was for the debtor to write a promissory note that the steward would keep until the debt was paid; cf. Philem. 18.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that the average olive tree yields 120 kilos of olives or 25 liters of oil. Kistemaker 1980: 231 and Manson 1949: 291–92 put the number more precisely at 868 gallons or 3,946 liters, using the scale provided by Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.9 §57. Marshall 1978: 618–19 notes that ancient measuring jars found in archeological digs vary from 5 gallons to 10 gallons. Given this variation, precise numbers are difficult to determine, but the number is not as important as recognizing that this is a large debt.

15 Measures in the ancient world varied somewhat, so an exact figure is uncertain; see Plummer 1896: 383 and Marshall 1978: 619. BAGD 445

places the measure of a cor at 393 liters or 10–12 bushels. Fitzmyer 1985: 1101 points out that Josephus defines κόρος variously: Antiquities 15.9.2 §314 says that it equals 10 medimnoi, while Antiquities 3.15.3 §321 says four-sevenths of a medimnos—a significant difference (a medimnos was an Attic measure that equaled about 1.5 bushels, a figure that seems very high and is thus questioned). Fitzmyer figures the amount on Josephus's smaller standard, which produces a debt of slightly more than 100 bushels, but he notes that the variation makes certainty difficult.

25 For a defense of the verse's appropriateness to this setting, see Marshall 1978: 622.

36 Talbert 1982: 153 calls 16:8b the first interpretation of the parable, though this is true only by implication; also Marshall 1978: 619–20 (opting for an end at 16:8a).

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

16 On Matthew, see Hill 1972: 200–201. Perrin 1963: 172–74 does not discuss Luke 16:16b because, in his view, it is a later addition to the tradition, a view that grows out of his identifying the two texts as the same tradition. Marshall 1978: 630 argues almost single-handedly for a positive sense in Matthew: “Men of violence seize at the opportunity of entering the kingdom.” This is not likely.

24 Marshall notes that Jesus’ reference to not marrying a divorced person goes beyond what Judaism allowed; SB 1:320–21.

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978: 636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

33 On the phrase “Moses and the prophets,” see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1136–37 argues that all of the material is from Q, but that 17:2 has been influenced by Mark 9:42. Marshall 1978: 640 agrees that Q and Mark overlap in 17:1–2 and also sees (pp. 642, 643–44) the rest of 17:3–6 as coming from Q, though he entertains the possibility that Q has various forms from which Matthew and Luke drew. Creed 1930: 215 sees Q and Mark 11:23 exercising influence in 17:5–6. Ernst 1977: 477–80 sees 17:1–3a as coming from either Q or a form of oral tradition that circulated in a variety of forms, 17:3b–4 as rooted in Jesus' teaching, and triple tradition (i.e., Mark and Q) influencing 17:5–6. Ellis 1974: 207 speaks of Mark and Q in 17:1–4 and regards Luke's special source as responsible for 17:5–10. Egelkraut 1976: 120–21 speaks of Q/Mark overlap in 17:1–2 and multiple tradition in 17:5–6. Grundmann 1963: 331 suggests that it is hard to know if Q or Luke's special material is responsible for the unit, except for 17:7–10, which is L. Grundmann sees its roots in material earlier than the versions of Matthew and Mark. All of this assumes that only one form of these sayings existed in the tradition and that it emerged from a single saying. If this was a theme repeated by Jesus, multiple renderings could well exist.

9 Marshall 1978: 642 ties it to 17:3b–4 by arguing that it is anticlimactic if it looks back. In fact, the reminder can be seen as emphatic.

2 So Wiefel 1988: 305 and Bruners 1977. Bruners also argues that the account is Lucan. Fitzmyer 1985: 1150–51 and H. Betz 1981 question the connection. At most, it is a form parallel. Betz's main thesis (1971) that the account is a polemic against healing miracles is incorrect; see Marshall 1978: 649. Meier 1994: 750–51 shows how an appeal to Lucan creation from 2 Kings cannot explain four differences in the account: (1) no mention of Elijah, (2) no mention of Jesus as prophet, (3) no delay in the miracle's occurrence, and (4) the different kind of miracle in the account (punitive versus healing).

2 Luke 17:23 with Mark 13:21, and Luke 17:31 with Mark 13:15–16. In addition, Marshall 1978: 656 notes that Luke 17:25 is often tied to Marcan passion predictions and Luke 17:33 to Mark 8:35.

8 Conzelmann 1960: 105 n. 3, 123 suggests that this speech is the "insider" explanation for Jesus' remarks. So also Zmijewski 1972: 417–19, although he acknowledges the possibility of a special Lucan source. Against a Lucan redaction are Kümmel 1957: 29; Colpe, TDNT 8:450–51; and Marshall 1978: 659, who notes that Luke does not create Son-of-Man sayings and that the text has a good claim to authenticity. In addition, the criterion of multiple attestation favors authenticity.

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

21 Marshall 1978: 664 and Plummer 1896: 409 deny the idea of escape, arguing that the point is a prohibition against coming down to collect possessions; but are the two points mutually exclusive? The comparison with Lot's wife in 17:32 suggests an escape. Nolland 1993a: 861 argues that part of the point is a willingness to flee and leave one's possessions behind, which reinforces earlier teaching about how riches can ensnare their possessor.

25 Marshall 1978: 666 speaks of the possibility of different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 145 argues that the Lucan saying reflects Q and that Matthew moved it. But is this any better, given the double use of this saying in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25, with neither being in an eschatological context? Plummer 1896: 409 suggests that the idea was often repeated. If he is right, a special Lucan source is just as likely. The theme gives evidence of going back to Jesus through such a source.

29 On ἀετός, see Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12; Job 39:27; Matt. 24:28; BAGD 19; BAA 36; Marshall 1978: 669. Ἀετός can refer to an eagle, but not here, since eagles do not seek out dead meat; Rev. 12:14; 4:7; 8:13; Arndt 1956: 376. Attempts to interpret ἀετός as eagle, recalling the Roman emblem that accompanied the invasion of Jerusalem, assume a post–a.d. 70 date for Luke, as well as suggest an image contextually distant from the metaphor here; but so Danker 1988: 294; Leaney 1958: 232; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1173 (with less certainty).

13 Marshall discusses the options for the syntax of εἰς τέλος, which can be translated “finally,” “completely,” or “unceasingly.” This term can describe either when the coming occurs or how it occurs. Does the woman finally come? Does she completely wear out the judge? Does she unceasingly come? The middle option is more likely.

4 So the aorist passive participle σταθείς (as he stood); BAGD 382 §II.1b; BAA 775 §II.1b. The circumstantial aorist passive participle of ἵστημι is found in the NT only in Luke’s writings: Luke 18:40; 19:8; Acts 2:14; 5:20; 11:13; 17:22; 25:18; 27:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1186. In the Jewish world, it was not unusual to stand and pray (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:14, 22; Plummer 1896: 416; SB 1:401–2; 2:240; Marshall 1978: 679).

13 Jeremias 1963a: 141 overstates the parallelism with Pauline usage, as do Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 and Arndt 1956: 380. Linnemann 1966: 62–63, 144–46 n. 11; Ernst 1977: 497–98; and Marshall 1978: 680–81 are clearer. Cf. Ps. 51:19 [51:21 MT]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 12:7; 1Q28b [= 1QSb] 4.22.

3 There is no need to regard the story as a creation based on 2 Kings 4:27, but so Bultmann 1963: 32, who also cites a rabbinic story from the later b. Ketub. 63a, where disciples try to dissuade Akiva from seeing his mother. This approach is rightly rejected by Fitzmyer 1985: 1192 and Marshall 1978: 681–82.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

13 Later Judaism used a similar saying about an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to refer to an impossible dream or an illogical argument; Lachs 1987: 331–32; b. Ber. 55b; b. B. Mes\;. 38b; SB 1:828; Marshall 1978: 687.

4 Luke often mentions written Scripture: Luke 4:17; 7:27; 10:26; 20:17; 21:22; 22:37; 24:44, 46; Acts 13:29; 24:14 (Schrenk, TDNT 1:748; Marshall 1978: 690).

6 Another stylistic difference may reflect Matthean–Lucan agreement but is tied to a textual issue in Mark: Matthew has τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ (on the third day) and Luke has τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ τρίτῃ (on the third day) where many key Marcan manuscripts read μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας (after three days). It is possible, however, that all three accounts agree, since the textual evidence for μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας in Mark is largely Alexandrian plus D (the other reading in Mark is τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ; A, W, Θ, family 1, family 13, Byz). But μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας is more difficult, which speaks in its favor; Marshall 1978: 690. The variant makes the reference slightly clearer, though for Mark "after three days" is to be read inclusively.

8 The more intensive ἀποκρύπτω (to conceal) is used in contrast to unveiling (ἀποκαλύπτω) revelation and the mystery of God's plan (Luke 10:21; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). Luke uses the synonymous παρακαλύπτω (to conceal) in Luke 9:45 and κρύπτω (to hide) in 19:42 (Marshall 1978: 691).

3 Bultmann 1963: 33–34 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1219 take 19:8 as a Lucan addition, breaking the flow of the story. Marshall 1978: 695 agrees with Bultmann that 19:10 may be a later comment, but Fitzmyer sees it as part of the account. Schweizer 1984: 290 regards 19:8 as a non-Lucan addition to the story, while Luke is responsible for 19:10. Those who see Luke adding 19:10 often suggest that it is his version of the famous ransom saying of Mark 10:45.

9 This Jewish connection reflects the presence of the tradition (so Leaney 1958: 241–42, against Marshall 1978: 698, who sees a Lucan or edited comment).

3 This view goes back to D. F. Strauss (1972: 352–53 [orignally 1840]), as Plummer 1896: 437 notes. Ellis 1974: 221–22 holds out the possibility of two parables. Marshall 1978: 702 holds that this text supports his two-versions-of-Q theory.

20 Marshall 1978: 708 sees this verse as proof of the secondary character of the earlier references to cities (19:17, 19), since cities are not mentioned here; but this is merely literary condensing.

21 Jeremias 1963a: 62 holds that Jesus' audience interrupted him; so also Plummer 1896: 442, who argues that the crowd thinks Jesus is spoiling the parable; so also Nolland 1993b: 916–17. Klostermann 1929: 189; Marshall 1978: 708; and Danker 1988: 309 hold that the interruption comes from attendants in the parable. If 19:26–27 maintains the parabolic perspective, and 19:27 looks as if it does, then those who react here come from within the parable and comment as a crowd to the king. Of course, since the king represents Jesus, there is no real difference in sense in the choice. If Jesus speaks, he simply gives the parable's lesson.

15 That Luke is the only Synoptist to note this praise leads Marshall 1978: 714 to raise the possibility that Luke uses another source because of the unusual combinations of ἐγγίζω with πρός (to draw near to) and πρός with the dative. The latter construction occurs only here in Luke, six times elsewhere in the NT (Mark 5:11; John 18:16; 20:11, 12 [twice]; Rev. 1:13; BDR §240.2), and 104 times in the LXX.

16 In Gen. 4:10 Abel's spilled blood cries out, and esp. in Hab. 2:11 Jerusalem's stones cry out against Israel's injustice and sin. Marshall 1978: 716 notes the possibility that creation will speak out against the sin of the Pharisees (Jeremias, TDNT 4:270), an option that is less satisfying contextually than the standard OT use of the image; so correctly SB 2:253, which notes the use of this figure in Judaism: Tg. Hab. 2:11; Midr. Ps. 73.4 on 73:10 (= Braude 1959: 2.4).

26 As in Gen. 50:24–25; Exod. 3:7, 16; Job 10:12; 29:4; Wis. 2:20; 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:12; and 1 Clem. 50.3; correctly Marshall 1978: 719. Fitzmyer 1985: 1259 does not specify which view he holds.

8 Plummer 1896: 454 notes other examples of the periphrastic ἦν διδάσκων (was teaching) are 4:31; 5:17; 13:10. Temple teaching is mentioned elsewhere in Luke 21:37; 22:53 = Mark 14:49; Marshall 1978: 722.

9 Λίθον (stone) undergoes reverse attraction to ὅν (which) and is picked up by οὗτος (this one) later in the verse; Marshall 1978: 732; BDR §295.2.

14 Arguing that the point revolves around both the image and the inscription, Giblin 1971 attempts to ground the reply in an allusion to Isa. 44:5. According to this verse, God's inscription on people is that they "belong to him," a concept that leads Jesus to speak of rendering to God what is his. Marshall 1978: 736 is right that this is a correct theological deduction but not explicit in the text.

20 A similar use of βίος occurs in 8:43. The term has a slightly different force in 15:12, 30, where it means "inheritance"; Marshall 1978: 752.

4 A detailed demonstration of the solution to this problem is beyond the scope of a commentary on Luke. Marshall 1978: 758 notes that no good solution to the transmission question can be clearly demonstrated and that the general teaching coheres with Jesus' teaching elsewhere—which means that the material's core goes back to Jesus. Each of the monographs behind views 1–4 engages in detailed analyses of the text and its OT roots—something more conservative studies frequently lack. Wenham's work (view 5) is an exception to this pattern, as is that of Beasley-Murray.

12 On the grammar of ταῦτα ἅ (these things which), see Marshall 1978: 759. The construction is an anacoluthon; BDF §466.1.

16 Even Marshall 1978: 762 suggests that διδάσκαλος shows Luke to have a public setting in mind, as opposed to a private discussion with the disciples (though he notes that 21:12–19 suggests an audience of disciples). Nevertheless, the parallel in Mark may well imply that Luke is following tradition here rather than using his technical sense for διδάσκαλος. In simplifying his introduction, the specific audience was lost.

18 Fitzmyer follows Conzelmann 1960: 126; but correctly Marshall 1978: 762. Danker 1988: 329 notes that the issues of Jerusalem's destruction and the end-time were linked in most people's minds; one suggests the other. Jesus' answer goes beyond the temple. Zmijewski 1972: 93–95 suggests that the reference to the "coming days" in 21:6 suggests an eschatological setting, since ἡμέρα (day) alludes to the day of the Lord. It must be remembered that any judgment that consumed Jerusalem would be seen as catastrophic, so either event—Jerusalem's fall or the temple's removal—would suggest severe judgment. The disciples are asking, "When will that judgment come?"

21 Fitzmyer 1985: 1337 is against a source. Creed 1930: 255 and Leaney 1958: 260 say Luke inserted the phrase because he was detailing what was sketched in previous verses. Marshall 1978: 764–65 speaks of the great puzzlement that this addition has caused and mentions the possible influence of another source (also Schramm 1971: 174–75). Perhaps this one source had the two eschatological discourses that Luke reflects. But what caused the difference? Did Luke or his source supply a clarifying stylistic break? Either option is possible.

25 Against Ellis 1974: 244, a "Christian prophet" is not likely in view (see Marshall 1978: 769). If it is, it is only in the broadest sense of forth-telling, as opposed to a special group of gifted saints.

36 Marshall 1978: 775 notes that, in Greek astrological texts, συνοχή signifies the dismay caused by unfavorable omens, while Manson 1949: 332 says that it denotes "bewildered despair." Conzelmann, TDNT 7:440, says that the apocalyptic coloring is stronger in Luke.

40 For refutation of France's attempt (1971: 227–39) to tie this remark to a.d. 70, see Marshall 1978: 776–77, who notes that the presence of cosmic signs, the force of Dan. 7:13, and the context all argue against such a view. Marshall also defends the saying's authenticity and rightly questions attempts to reject the saying because of the Synoptic mixture of OT text (Ps. 110 and Dan. 7) or by holding that other sayings such as Mark 8:38 or 14:62 are earlier. Colpe, TDNT 8:450, and Perrin 1967: 173–85 deny authenticity; Hooker 1967: 148–59 and Borsch 1967: 361–64 defend it.

41 Marshall 1978: 777 notes that the antecedent of τούτων (these things) is unclear and opts for a reference to the signs, but it is more likely since the term is plural that the ambiguity is intentional and refers to the whole package (i.e., signs plus the Son of Man). Regardless of the choice, the decision represents only a slight difference, with the reference to the whole package being slightly broader than a reference just to cosmic signs.

1 Fitzmyer 1985: 1383 overstates the passage by arguing that Matthew and Luke are different. Marshall 1978: 791–92 suggests that the Lucan details point to arrangement.

1 Marshall 1978: 793 speaks of two traditions, one a eucharistic tradition (Mark 14:22–24 = Luke 22:19–20; 1 Cor. 11:23–26), the other a farewell-meal tradition (Luke 22:15–18, 24–30, 35–38; Mark 14:25).

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

4 Ὥρα (hour) occurs many times in the passion narrative, including Mark 14:35, 41; John 12:23; 13:1; 17:1; Luke 22:53. Because ὥρα carries no qualifiers (as in 22:53), it conveys no special sense of God's hour (against Grundmann 1963: 392 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1384; as noted by Marshall 1978: 794 and especially Soards 1987: 33).

13 Jeremias 1966: 156–59 argues that the short text attempted to preserve a shortened reference to the initial cup without removing it altogether. The short text's goal was to keep the liturgy secret, an explanation that Marshall 1980: 38 rejects. More likely it is a scribal reduction for liturgical reasons.

15 Danker 1988: 345 and Jeremias 1966: 208–9 argue that in preparation for his coming suffering Jesus did not drink the wine. Schürmann 1952: 63–65, Plummer 1896: 495–96, and Marshall 1978: 798 argue that he did drink the wine.

18 The debate over the original wording of the tradition is complex and ultimately irresolvable, since it rests on so much speculation about what is likely. Marshall 1978: 804 and Schürmann 1955: 30–34, 123–28 argue for originality, Patsch 1972: 142–50 against it. Nolland 1993b: 1047 sees it as a later but quite accurate gloss, since Jesus looks to affirm his ongoing relationship to them despite his coming suffering.

20 On the various views, see the summary in Marshall 1978: 805–6, who argues that in general Luke's form is the most primitive, but notes the difficulty of the decision. Fitzmyer 1985: 1402 prefers Mark's originality, as does Nolland 1993b: 1047, who mostly follows Ruckstuhl 1980.

2 Marshall 1978: 808 notes the use of "hand" to portray kind intent (Gen. 21:18; Ps. 80:17 [80:18 MT]; 89:21 [89:22 MT]) or hostile intent (1 Sam. 18:21; 22:17; 24:12–13 [24:13–14 MT]; 2 Sam. 14:19). Lohse, TDNT 9:430, argues that "hand" refers to the sharing of the meal; it seems, however, that the allusion is negative, since "hand" is a metonymy for an action performed by someone.

3 Marshall 1978: 808 assumes at least two sources. Fitzmyer 1985: 1408–9 mentions the transposition, but acknowledges the possibility of another source.

6 While recognizing that the two accounts share some similarities, V. Taylor 1972: 61–64; Schürmann 1957: 63–99; Marshall 1978: 811; and Grundmann 1963: 400 note that Luke does not delay Marcan texts like this elsewhere.

9 Marshall 1978: 812 wonders if ποιήσετε (you shall [not] do) is to be supplied; cf. BDF §480.5.

12 This verse is unique to Luke and reflects an independent source, which Fitzmyer 1985: 1412 calls L. Conceptual parallels are found in Mark 10:45 and Matt. 23:8–10; Marshall 1978: 813–14; Danker 1988: 349–50.

18 But so Fitzmyer 1985: 1419, who speaks of "reconstituted Israel," and Marshall 1978: 817, who suggests an allusion to the Lord's Supper, along with many others (those who see a tie to Israel include Ellis 1974: 256 and Danker 1988: 350–51). Dupont 1964: 388 correctly argues against this view. This expectation is continued in the question of Acts 1:6–8 and the remarks of Peter in Acts 3:18–21. Even later Petrine expectation of a new heaven and earth in 2 Pet. 3:10–14, which looks to the ultimate end of history, does not remove this intervening stage when God deals with Israel in bringing it again into the blessing reserved for God's people.

19 Luke uses δέομαι fifteen times, Matthew once (Matt. 9:38), and Mark and John not at all; Fitzmyer 1985: 1425; Marshall 1978: 821.

20 Marshall 1978: 821 argues that ἐκλείπω (elsewhere in the NT at Luke 16:9; 23:45; Heb. 1:12) here means "to disappear," so the idea is that Peter's faith does not disappear. He avoids ultimate failure (cf. Col. 1:21–23). Nolland's paraphrase (1993b: 1072) of faith "drained away to nothing" gives the sense.

21 Against Bultmann 1963: 267 n. 2, who argues that the original tradition did not know of Peter's denial; but so correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1425 and esp. Marshall 1978: 821.

22 Arndt 1956: 444 speaks of Peter's "again bec[oming] a believer," a most unfortunate way to express the force of the verb. Peter had this position all along. On turning, see Luke 17:4; Acts 3:19; 9:35; 11:21; 14:15; 15:19; 26:18, 20. On faith as faithfulness, see Luke 18:8; Acts 14:22; 16:5. Marshall 1978: 822 sees a possible allusion to 2 Sam. 15:20.

24 Marshall 1978: 823 notes that the vocabulary is Lucan, but that a redaction of Mark is not evident. Soards 1987: 39 overstates a detail here and argues that the Lucan Peter states his readiness before the prediction of his threefold denial, while the Marcan Peter says it is after the prediction. But the initial prediction in Mark and Matthew is of sheep scattered, not of the threefold denial. In addition, Peter has two refutations of Jesus' predictions, which serve as a bracket (Matt. 26:33, 35 = Mark 14:29, 31). Luke has only one remark (22:33), which comes first. A summary in Luke is evident, but a source cannot be excluded, since Luke 22:33 does not match the vocabulary of Matthew or Mark.

26 Arndt 1956: 444 suggests that Jesus communicated that the denial would come before morning and before a rooster crowed twice that evening. Marshall 1978: 823 argues that this is a summary of Mark. Since most assume that Luke did not know Matthew, the question is raised whether a summary is present or whether Luke had another source. Matthean prioritists simply see Luke following Matthew here.

33 Plummer 1896: 507 and Marshall 1978: 827 see the idiom here (based on Gen. 45:28; Exod. 9:28; Deut. 3:26; 1 Kings 19:4; 1 Chron. 21:15; 1 Macc. 2:33). Doubt about its presence is expressed by Fitzmyer 1985: 1434 and Rengstorf, TDNT 3:295–96.

3 Stählin, TDNT 9:138, 140–41, notes that the kiss was probably seen as a disciple's greeting for his teacher. A simple custom has been transformed into a sign of betrayal. Marshall 1978: 835 notes "misused kisses" in Scripture (Gen. 27:26–27; 2 Sam. 15:5; Prov. 7:13; 27:6; esp. 2 Sam. 20:9) and Judaism (Sir. 29:5).

5 The style (ἰδόντες [seeing] at the start of a sentence) is frequent in Luke: 8:34, 47; 23:47; Marshall 1978: 836. The direct question with εἰ (if) is often used by Luke: e.g., Luke 13:23; Acts 1:6; 7:1; 19:2; 21:37; 22:25 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1448). But as Luke 22:67 shows, such a question can reflect parallels in the tradition. Luke is summarizing here.

6 On cutting off the ear, see Horst, TDNT 5:558, and Marshall 1978: 837. Daube 1960: 59–62 argues that such an act is an indirect insult to the master; cf. 2 Sam. 10:4–5.

8 The phrase to stretch out the hands looks like Jer. 6:12 but is merely idiomatic; Marshall 1978: 838; cf. John 7:30.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

8 Marshall 1978: 844 notes that elsewhere in his Gospel Luke does not add the title κύριος to Marcan material. Catchpole 1971: 168–69 argues against Lucan creation of this detail (pace Bultmann 1963: 168) and notes that στραφείς (turning) is common in Luke's special source (7:44; 9:55; 14:25; 23:28), although 7:9 and 10:23 may be Lucan or from a source shared with Matthew.

30 Marshall 1965–66: 347 and A. Moore 1966: 184–87 answer other objections to authenticity. Fitzmyer 1985: 1459 refuses to make a judgment on historicity, calling it impossible to reach a verdict. R. Brown 1994: 514–15 says that the conceptually parallel Mark 14:62 "may be close to the mindset and style of Jesus himself." Though he believes there is no way to determine this for certain (pp. 506–7), the remarks fit with authenticity. Brown even adds the argument that Mark's "you will see" statement is so ambiguous that it is unlikely to be created by the church.

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 1474 and Delling, TDNT 6:279, note that twenty-four uses of πλῆθος (company) are in Luke–Acts, with only one in Mark and none in Matthew. The combination ἅπαν (or πᾶν) τὸ πλῆθος (the whole company) is found in Luke 1:10; 8:37; 19:37; Acts 15:12; 25:24; Marshall 1978: 852. The idea of leading Jesus to Pilate shows the use of ἄγω for taking a criminal somewhere (Matt. 10:18; Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §303; BAGD 14 §2; BAA 25 §2).

4 Several terms in this verse are used frequently by Luke (Neyrey 1985: 78; Marshall 1978: 855–56): ἱκανὸς χρόνος (a long time; Luke 8:27; 20:9; Acts 8:11; 14:3; 27:9) and γίνεται σημεῖον (a sign occurs; Acts 2:43; 4:16, 22, 30; 5:12; 8:13; 14:3).

6 Marshall 1978: 856 notes Hooker's view (1967: 87–89) that this is not a Lucan creation of a literary detail to make the point about Isaiah.

7 Θέλων with an infinitive means "wishing to …"; 10:29; 23:8; Marshall 1978: 860.

4 Marshall 1978: 864 argues that this Semitic idiom means "do not weep so much for me as for yourselves," which is similar in force to 10:20.

6 Luce 1933: 349 sees an allusion to Isa. 54:1, but since the images are so different (i.e., in Isaiah the barren will bear a child), this is probably not correct; correctly Marshall 1978: 864 (cf. Luke 1:7, 25; Gal. 4:27) and R. Brown 1994: 923, who cites parallels from Lam. 4:4; Wis. 3:13; Eccles. 4:2–3; 2 Bar. 10.6–10 and argues that Luke received the saying from a sayings source.

8 Marshall 1978: 865 argues that this motif could be parallel to a desire to hide from catastrophe (as in Rev. 6:15–16). The Lucan context, however, is not one of relief, and it is not clear that the request in Revelation is any different. What those in Revelation wish to avoid is the wrath of the one on the throne. They would rather die than face his judgment; Rev. 9:6.

12 Marshall 1978: 867 suggests that Luke's lack of this detail argues for the presence of another source. On the details of the practice of crucifixion, see the exegesis of 23:21. A Jewish victim of crucifixion was recently found at Giv‹at ha-Mivtar (Nolland 1993b: 1145; bibliography on pp. 1140–41).

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

8 Dillon 1978: 21–22, who sees Lucan editorial work throughout the resurrection narrative, accepts an outside source here. Luce 1933: 358 says, “Very little in these verses (3–5) … suggests that Luke is using Mark.” Marshall 1978: 885 argues that the Johannine parallel shows the traditional point of contact.

11 Ζάω (to live) is an important NT term. The key Lucan uses are Luke 24:23; Acts 1:3; 25:19; cf. Mark 16:11; Luke 10:28; 15:32; 20:38; Acts

9:41; Gal. 2:20; Heb. 7:25; 1 Pet. 3:18 (ζῳοποιέω, to make alive); Rev. 1:18; Marshall 1978: 885; Bode 1970: 62.

20 Dillon's effort (1978: 149–51) to find a connection with John 21:9–13 seems forced. The catch of fish outdoors in the Sea of Galilee does not equal a meal indoors near Jerusalem. Only the motif of a shared meal is the same (Behm, TDNT 1:477; Marshall 1978: 898). Another post-resurrection meal occurs in Luke 24:41–43 and Mark 16:14 (if it is original).

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

24 The distributive singular καρδία indicates that the heart burned in each of them; Marshall 1978: 898; Col. 3:16; BDF §140. The periphrastic idiom pictures a running emotion; Plummer 1896: 557–58. On the sense of καρδία in Luke, see 1:51, 66; 2:19, 35, 51; 3:15; 5:22; 9:47; 24:25; Tiede 1988: 437.

13 Ἐνθάδε is a Lucan term (Acts 10:18; 16:28; 17:6; 25:17, 24); the only use outside Luke's writings is twice in John 4:15–16; Plummer 1896: 560; Marshall 1978: 903.

18 The meaning of οὕτως is not clear (Marshall 1978: 905). Fitzmyer 1985: 1583 argues that it means "so" the Scripture speaks, referring to the manner of the message and thus focusing on its content. It could also be causative (Klostermann 1929: 242, pointing to 24:26), thus meaning

“because” the Scripture must be fulfilled. Either possibility makes good sense; the second emphasizes design a little more.

22 Ἕως is a general reference to “the area of,” especially when combined with ἔξω (outside); BDR §239.3.3; Acts 17:14; 21:5; 26:11; Gen. 38:1; Ezek. 48:1; Marshall 1978: 908. But ἔξω is textually disputed; see the additional note.

2 Jeremias 1966: 15–84 deals with various aspects of this issue. Other key studies include Hoehner 1977: 74–90; Marshall 1980: 30–75 (which has the advantage of assessing Jeremias’s claims); Jaubert 1965; Blinzler 1958; and R. Brown 1962b. For bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1035–40.

4 Marshall 1980: 65–66 regards this series of events as the most problematic reference, but he also notes that it is equally problematic for the day before Passover. On the historicity of the Roman setting and trial customs as tied to the governor’s assize, see Kinman 1991.

7 This is the best option to Marshall, though it is not without problems—mainly that it requires slaughtering on two consecutive days, when no direct evidence suggests such was the case.

9 See McArthur 1960: 105–27; Carson 1984: 126–27; Jeremias 1963b: 1–12, 19–23; Hunter 1965: 107–11; Toussaint 1980: 86–94; Bauman 1985; and J. Martin 1986.

10 J. Martin 1986: 47–48. Martin’s list of reasons is longer than mine, but his other reasons are more supportive than decisive. See J. Martin 1992 for an updated defense.

17 Any charge today that dispensationalism sees two ways of salvation or sees too great a law/grace contrast in the sermon grossly misrepresents

where many of its adherents are now. Such a monolithic view of dispensationalism fails to see the variations that have long been a part of this approach. Gerstner 1991 irresponsibly engages in such confusion and minimizes the significance of such differences, which dispensationalists like C. C. Ryrie and J. D. Pentecost have long noted. Gerstner's charge of antinomianism is a distortion that warps his ability to appreciate the distinctions in the movement. The charge also underestimates the significance of the current discussion about the function of the law within covenant theology, as well as its debate with theonomy; see D. Turner 1991; J. Martin 1986; and J. Martin 1992.

15 Manson 1949: 130 suggests that Isa. 49:6 is alluded to in the parable. Blomberg 1990: 235–36 says that the second invitation merely reflects Middle Eastern custom, but with all the representation present in the parable, surely the arrival of "outsiders" suggests a correspondence in real terms. See R. Martin 1976.

11 Creed 1930: 218–19; Sneed 1962; Dalman 1909: 145–47; Dodd 1961: 62–63 (who later switched to view 2). See Mattill 1979: 193 and Beasley-Murray 1986: 101 for details on the Gospel of Thomas, Origen, Chrysostom, Athanasius, Ambrose, Jerome, and Luther.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that "in your midst" is not possible. Schlosser 1980:

1.202–4 argues that “in one’s power” is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for “in the midst of.” His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

13 Jeremias 1980: 266 attributes this digression from Luke’s common expression to the presence of a traditional source. Also, Mattill 1979: 197 notes that, since the Greek versions variously translate Exod. 34:9 with ἐν μέσῳ (Theodotion, Symmachus) and ἐντός (Aquila), the phrases can be synonymous (Field 1875: 1.144). Beasley-Murray 1986: 101–2 adds a similar example from Exod. 17:7 (Field 1875: 1.111). Note also Symmachus in Lam. 1:3 and Ps. 87:6 LXX [88:6 Engl.] (Field 1875: 747, 239). Meier 1994: 479 notes that this translation appears in the literal Aquila and the more idiomatic Symmachus, making the meaning of ἐντός clear. These ancient texts show that “in the midst” is a well-attested sense for the term.

14 Mattill 1979: 198–201 lays out the reasoning and opts for a sense of “the kingdom will be among you and be in your power to grasp”—an example of the semantic error of totality transfer, since he gives two meanings to one term.

45 Mattill 1979: 97–100 surveys each NT use of ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη and opts for the usual sense of view 1. He does not, however, give any indication of the debate over 16:8; see also Jeremias 1971a: 135. Jesus’ speech most likely would have been in Aramaic, which makes the Semitic point relevant, but only if one assumes a term-for-term rendering. A sense-rendering of Jesus’ discourse would escape this objection.

20 Grundmann, TDNT 3:545, though he overemphasizes baptism here. The fruit is submission to God through repentance, which in turn is productive; also Behm, TDNT 4:1001. The presence of more than one tree argues against seeing trees as a corporate image equal to Israel, as Maurer, TDNT 6:988 §4a, holds. What John says about the day of judgment applies to any unproductive person, though it is clear that John's audience is a Jewish one.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n. 66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

31 Maurer, TDNT 8:161; Schrage, TDNT 8:288 n. 129; Lohse, TDNT 9:431–32 §C4. In the Marcan examples, this is often requested of Jesus; Nolland 1989: 213.

20 Luke alone refers explicitly to the cloth as καινός, which here means "unused." He uses the term three times in the verse, so it has a touch of emphasis. I translated it "new" to keep the parallelism and linkage clear. It usually refers to a qualitative newness; Bovon 1989: 263. So here it means a new and better teaching. Luke returns to the use of νέος in 5:37–38 in agreement with the Synoptic parallels; Behm, TDNT 3:448; Matt. 9:17; Luke 22:20. On this metaphor, see Maurer, TDNT 7:961 §4a.

29 On αἰτέω meaning much is "asked" ethically of someone, see Stählin, TDNT 1:191. In the financial realm, the term can indicate the "payment asked" by someone (on the similar use of ζητέω [to seek], see Greeven, TDNT 2:892 §1). A similar commercial term is παρατίθημι (to commit or deposit) (Maurer, TDNT 8:163). The verse emphasizes ethical responsibility and uses imagery that compares such responsibility to fiscal responsibility.

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

30 Schweizer 1984: 176 notes that the force is spatial. Marshall 1978: 422 notes that in 11:20, which uses a different term, φθάνω, Luke clearly means "arrived." On the relationship between ἐγγίζω and φθάνω, see Fitzer, TDNT 9:89, esp. n. 10. Does 10:9 say the same thing as 11:20? It most likely does. Marshall does not think the spatial argument is as key as the argument of 11:20. For a full defense of the kingdom declared as arrived in this verse, see Bock 1992c. For the debate over the Aramaic behind the sayings and the difficulty of determining it, see Meier 1994: 432–34, 486–87. Luke's ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (upon you) is missing in the Matthean parallel and may represent his explanation of the sayings' force. The present effects of the kingdom are clearly in view (10:23–24; Nolland 1993a: 554). Schürmann 1994: 74 cites 7:28; 16:16; and 17:20–21 as conceptually parallel.

56 For the options, see Meier 1994: 489–90, who opts for a Matthean change to "righteous" because of Matt. 10:41 and 23:29 and because "kings and prophets" is a more natural combination. If a change is made from one tradition, this direction makes more sense than Luke's making the change.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

5 Marshall 1978: 455 sees either two versions or Matthew's adding to an original short edition like that in Luke. These reflect distinct recensions of Q; but he does not discuss the number of events. Jeremias 1971a: 193–96 argues for the originality of the Lucan form and posits an Aramaic form behind it. He regards its structure as memorable in an oral context, carrying rhyme and a two-four rhythm (so also Meier 1994: 293). Beasley-Murray 1986: 147 argues that Luke's version is original in extent, but that Matthew's is closer to the original wording, a view close to Nolland's (noted above). For him Luke's prayer circulated in Gentile Christian circles, while Matthew's was the Jewish-Christian version. Nevertheless, for him the prayer's roots go back to Jesus. Wiefel 1988: 215 is less certain of this attempt to distinguish communities.

3 Twelftree 1993 gives a detailed survey of the texts involving Jesus as exorcist. After a careful study, he concludes: “The first result we can record from our study is that we are able unhesitatingly to support the view that Jesus was an exorcist” (p. 225). This theme is too widely attested in the sources to be denied. Meier 1994: 646–77 is more circumspect in his approach to the seven NT exorcisms, rating some as having historical roots: the possessed boy (Mark 9:14–29 = Matt. 17:14–21 = Luke 9:37–43a), Mary Magdalene (Luke 8:2), and the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:1–20 = Matt. 8:28–34 = Luke 8:26–39). Luke 4:33–37 = Mark 1:21–28 (man in the synagogue) probably reflects “the sort of thing” that Jesus did in ministry. Meier is uncertain about the account of the mute/blind demoniac (in part, because of its brevity), though leaning toward historicity (Luke 11:14–15 = Matt. 12:22–23). Meier doubts Matt. 9:32–33 (mute demoniac) and Mark 7:24–30 = Matt. 15:21–28 (Syrophoenician woman). With typical circumspection, Meier concludes: “A decision that in any of these exorcisms a true miracle has taken place—in other words, that God has directly acted beyond all human potentiality to heal a particular individual—goes beyond what any scholar can say on purely historical grounds” (p. 661). Ironically enough, to decide for miracle is the very conclusion that Jesus’ remarks desire.

6 For detailed defense of authenticity, see Meier 1994: 408–9 (on 11:17–18), 409–10 (11:19), 414–17 (11:20), 417 (11:21–22). Meier prefers to separate 11:20 from 11:17–18 in the earlier tradition, as well as from 11:21–22. He does think it likely that 11:20 was tied to 11:19. For agnosticism about this entire process of sorting out the relationship of 11:20 to 11:19, see Dunn 1988: 40–41 and n. 31. As noted above, I too am agnostic, if not outright skeptical, of sorting out clearly the question of the original unity of this tradition. However, I see no compelling reason to reject its unity, especially in light of the connection between 11:19 and 11:21–22 that I shall argue for below (see the exegesis of these verses).

2 Marshall 1978: 563 also leans toward independence for the door imagery, though he sees elements of connection with the tradition in the rest of the passage and sees Luke bringing some elements of this material together. Fitzmyer 1985: 1021–22 sees a Lucan hand in most of the material and sees only 13:24–29 as Q material, though he acknowledges that the case is not certain. Nolland 1993a: 732 attributes 13:22–23 to Luke and the rest mainly to traditional roots, most shared with Matthew. Most argue that the theme of presence or entry of blessing brought the texts together (Meier 1994: 310) and that Luke rearranged 13:28–29 by placing what was at the end at the start of the saying. Meier 1994: 311 lists the Lucan order of Matthean elements as 9, 10, 4, 5, 6, 7, 2, 3, 5, with four Lucan redactional stichs. It is more credible, however, to see a fresh tradition, given all the restructuring required of the alternative.

3 I disagree with Meier 1994: 315 that Jesus' teaching did not suggest a Gentile mission soon, but solely held out for an eschatological inclusion in the distant future. The previous parable in 13:18–19 suggests such an inclusion. The eschatological hope implies the possibility of current mission.

2 Fitzmyer 1985: 1039 remarks that, even though Matt. 12:11 has a similar saying, the rest of the detail is too different to be attributed to Q. In fact, it is too difficult for any other shared tradition. Fitzmyer also correctly denies that Luke 6:9 is a doublet to this verse. Marshall 1978: 578 sees a Q connection as possible. Bultmann 1963: 12 and Lohse, TDNT 7:26, argue that the text was a variant tradition created from Mark 3:1–6, but Ernst 1977: 435 correctly notes that the distinct terminology and motives suggest too much distance for this connection; so also Meier 1994: 710.

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

11 For discussion of the name Lazarus, see Dunkerley 1958–59; Derrett 1970: 78–99; Cave 1968–69; B. Scott 1989: 149 n. 28; SB 2:223; Meier 1994: 825, 868 n. 158.

2 So Wiefel 1988: 305 and Bruners 1977. Bruners also argues that the account is Lucan. Fitzmyer 1985: 1150–51 and H. Betz 1981 question the connection. At most, it is a form parallel. Betz's main thesis (1971) that the account is a polemic against healing miracles is incorrect; see Marshall 1978: 649. Meier 1994: 750–51 shows how an appeal to Lucan creation from 2 Kings cannot explain four differences in the account: (1) no mention of Elijah, (2) no mention of Jesus as prophet, (3) no delay in the miracle's occurrence, and (4) the different kind of miracle in the account (punitive versus healing).

9 Most, like Talbert 1982: 166, see Jesus attacking apocalyptic calendar-setting, but this needs careful definition in view of NT exhortations to watch carefully for the Son of Man's return. Granted, a specific date cannot and should not be sought, but sensitivity to general eschatological sequence or to watchfulness is never condemned (Matt. 24–25 = Mark 13; Luke 21:5–36; Acts 3:11–26). The view is right to deny date-setting, but is wrong to see the only sign as "Spirit-empowered ministry." New Testament eschatological hope is more specific and futurist than this denial suggests. In a more balanced approach, Beasley-Murray 1986: 100 notes that there are "signs" to see—if one has the eyes to see them. Meier 1994: 425 mentions texts where Jesus urges the community of faith to be prepared for a long ministry (Luke 21:7–24; 19:11; Acts 1:6–7; Mark 13:10). But disciples are still to keep looking for Jesus (Matt. 24–25 = Mark 13 = Luke 21:5–36).

13 Jeremias 1980: 266 attributes this digression from Luke's common expression to the presence of a traditional source. Also, Mattill 1979: 197 notes that, since the Greek versions variously translate Exod. 34:9 with ἐν μέσῳ (Theodotion, Symmachus) and ἐντός (Aquila), the phrases can be synonymous (Field 1875: 1.144). Beasley-Murray 1986: 101–2 adds a similar example from Exod. 17:7 (Field 1875: 1.111). Note also Symmachus in Lam. 1:3 and Ps. 87:6 LXX [88:6 Engl.] (Field 1875: 747, 239). Meier 1994: 479 notes that this translation appears in the literal Aquila and the more idiomatic Symmachus, making the meaning of ἐντός clear. These ancient texts show that "in the midst" is a well-attested sense for the term.

11 Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§42–49, mentions the healing skill of Solomon, thus providing a base for this description of David's son. This view is contrary to Nolland 1993b: 900, who argues against a Jewish expectation of a Davidic healer. His point is correct, but these traditions raise the question of what connections Jesus' acts of healing might surface. With all the eschatological ferment in Palestine in this period, why deny the possibility of such reflection on such events? Meier 1994: 689 is certainly correct to see the connection as not surprising in this setting.

6 For a methodological assessment of this debate, see R. Miller 1991. Sanders is unaware of Eppstein's 1964 article (see n. 1). Some in Judaism saw the temple as corrupt; 1 Enoch 89.73–90.29; 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.1–12. Meier 1994: 886 rightly calls the cleansing "prophetic action," but opts for a rejection of the temple rather than a cleansing. This ignores the connection to Isa. 56.

12 Friedrich, TDNT 6:835. Again, the Spirit serves as "testimony bearer" and "revelator"; Acts 2:17–18; 11:27; 13:1; 19:6; 21:9; Nolland 1989: 85. On the Lucan theme of the Spirit as the Spirit of prophecy, see Menzies 1991: 119–22.

9 For more details on the relationships of the various textual families, see Holmes 1983 and Metzger 1992.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

8 For internal arguments favoring this reading in Matt. 9:4, see Metzger 1975: 24. The UBS–NA committee went the other way in the Lucan passage, but the reasons for treating Luke differently from Matt. 9:4 are not clear. See Metzger 1975: 148.

36 On the external evidence favoring reading a question here, see Metzger 1975: 30–31. The meaning is not affected by the choice.

57 Metzger 1958–59: 303–4 notes other examples from the Targums and Pseudepigrapha that develop the number seventy.

59 This is why K. Aland (in Metzger 1975: 151) is certain that seventy-two was original. Wiefel 1988: 195 asks if seventy is not an attempt to get a round number.

6 Dalman 1909: 143–44 notes this suggestion by A. Meyer, who appeals to Aramaic נְטִיר (nēṭîr, observation) and בִּנְטִיר (binṭîr, secretly) in Tg. Job 4:12.

23 Schürmann 1969: 117 n. 160; Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:151; B. Meyer 1964: 43. The remark argues that the events, like revelation of an apocalyptic secret, transcend human understanding and require reflection.

2 Creed 1930: 132–33 cites E. Meyer’s complaint about the “rationalistic prejudice” of some critics in the 1920s.

19 Godet 1875: 2.64 notes that W. M. L. de Wette and H. A. W. Meyer held this view in the nineteenth century. Shirock 1992 now ably defends this view, noting that it was the view of Chrysostom, Homilies on Matthew 41 (on Matt. 12:25–26). He gives six reasons for the view, the most compelling of which I note on p. 1078. If this view is correct, a major reason for separating 11:19 from 11:20 in the original tradition—namely, the difference in meaning of "you" in each verse—disappears. Evidence of the presence God's kingdom is seen in Jesus and his followers. If this is the argument, Jesus is noting evidence of God's grace in Israel!

4 Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 48 (= Friedlander 1916: 378), an eighth-century text that is too late to be of real help; R. Brown 1977: 369. Gen. 21:3 may belong here in light of Gen. 21:4–5, but it is hard to be sure; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:82.

18 Jer. 31:31–33 [as writing the law on the heart]; Joel 2:28–32 [3:1–5 MT]; 1QS 4.21–22; Danker 1988: 64; SB 2:126–27; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:816–20, 826–27. On the view of some in ancient Judaism that the Spirit's revelatory work ceased sometime before the Maccabean period, see 1 Macc. 9:27; 14:41.

25 Schürer 1973–87: 2.381–403; R. Meyer and H. Weiss, TDNT 9:11–48. For Luke and the Pharisees, see Carroll 1988.

16 Because it is a first-century work, 4 Macc. 13:17 provides key evidence: a martyr for the law is welcomed and praised by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. See also b. Qid. 72a; b. Giṭ. 57b; Pesikta Rabbati 43.4 (= Braude 1968: 2.761); R. Meyer, TDNT 3:825–26. In Pesikta Rabbati, if a person bows down to an idol, he or she will have a place at Esau's bosom, not Abraham's.

1 Nolland 1993b: 1177–78 assesses Meynet's 1978 proposal that a substantial portion of the chapter (i.e., 24:4–47) is chiastically structured around two themes: (1) Jesus is alive and (2) resurrection is announced by Jesus and the Scriptures. Nolland also has a full survey of the tradition-historical discussion and the history of the religious analogies (pp. 1177–88).

14 Rengstorf, TDNT 8:543; also Michaelis, TDNT 5:348, 373. Luke will call these men "witnesses" later in Luke–Acts (Luke 24:44–48; Acts 1:8). Such eyewitnesses were important to ancient historians: Thucydides 1.22.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §55; and Lucian's parody in How to Write History 4. See Du Plessis 1974: 265.

23 Exod. 30:1–9; Marshall 1978: 54; Michaelis, TDNT 4:264. For this narrow use of ναός as "Holy Place," see 1 Macc. 1:21–22; Fitzmyer 1981: 323; Schrenk, TDNT 3:232.

30 Luke 24:34; Acts 2:3; 7:2, 30, 35; 9:17; 13:31; 16:9; 26:16; Fitzmyer 1981: 324; Michaelis, TDNT 5:358. Acts 7:26 is an exception to this consistent usage.

61 Luke 24:23; Acts 26:19; 2 Cor. 12:1; Dan. 9:23; 10:1, 7, 8, 16 [all Theodotion]; Plummer 1896: 18. The experience is called a vision because Zechariah saw an angel, a being that normally goes unseen; Michaelis, TDNT 5:372. Luke is not psychologizing here; it is an angelophany. See Luke 1:11.

21 Exod. 13:2; Num. 3:12; Schürmann 1969: 104 n. 43; Fitzmyer 1981: 407–8; Frey 1930; Michaelis, TDNT 6:876–77 and n. 36; Bovon 1989: 121 n. 38.

15 Marshall 1978: 111; Leaney 1958: 96. The appearance of the angel is an angelophany, while the experience of heaven is more like a vision; Michaelis, TDNT 5:351.

16 BAGD 471 (with bibliography); BAA 957; Van Der Loos 1965: 465–68; Michaelis, TDNT 4:233–34; Harrison, NIDNTT 2:463–66; SB 4:745–63; Pousma 1975: 138–39. Λέπρα occurs in the NT only in Matt. 8:3 = Mark 1:42 = Luke 5:12–13. A related term, λεπρός, appears in Luke 4:27; 7:22; 17:12; Matt. 8:2; 10:8; 11:5; 26:6; Mark 1:40; 14:3.

57 The contrast in the verbs at the end of the passage is key. Βλέπω is used figuratively with the meaning “to perceive” in Rom. 7:23; 2 Cor. 7:8; Col. 2:5; Heb. 2:9; 10:25; Michaelis, TDNT 5:344.

9 Luke 7:37, 38, 46; 23:56; BAGD 529–30; BAA 1072; Michaelis, TDNT 4:800–801; Schürmann 1969: 432 n. 10. The importance of μύρον is shown by its use as perfume and its presence in the cult to purify priests, in the tabernacle for festal occasions, and by its use in burial to prevent stench and decay; Exod. 30:25–30; Josephus, Antiquities 3.8.6 §205; 19.9.1 §358; Luke 23:56. If this perfume were nard (Mark 14:3 = John 12:3), it would have cost about 300 denarii a pound, or the annual wage of a day laborer; BAGD 534; BAA 1080.

9 Michaelis, TDNT 4:247–48, describes the image as one of heavenly glory; so ἐξαστράπτων (gleaming like lightning); Ezek. 1:4, 7. Conceptual parallels occur in Ezek. 1:27–28; Dan. 10:6; Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10; Rev. 2:17; 6:2; 20:11; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:97; 1 Enoch 38.4; 104.2; 2 Bar. 51.

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

18 Michaelis, TDNT 7:379–80, rejects a connection to the Feast of Tabernacles; but see Boobyer 1942: 76–79; Ellis 1974: 143; Daube 1956: 30–32 (though some of his citations involve material that is much later than this period).

16 On ἁπλοῦς as "clear, pure, healthy," see BAGD 86 and BAA 171. When the eye is clear, it is healthy and takes in light. The eye is a figure for spiritual condition in Matt. 6:22; Prov. 4:18–19; 11:25 (ἁπλοῦς with a different sense); T. Iss. 3.4; 4.6; Bauernfeind, TDNT 1:386; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377; Harder, TDNT 6:556; SB 1:302, 431–32, 722, 833.

1 Schweizer 1984: 225–26, though noting links to Matthew, suggests that the tradition may have come together before Luke, because of non-Lucan language in 13:25–27. Luce 1933: 240 sees too little correspondence to attribute the material to Q, as does Grundmann 1963: 284, who speaks of a special Lucan source. Michaelis, TDNT 5:71, argues for distinct traditions of the image of the open door.

20 Σκηνή is the OT term used for "booths" and alludes to the picture of blessing that was tied to celebrating the exodus; Lev. 23:34. See also Mark 9:5; Rev. 7:15; 21:3; 1 Enoch 39.4; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 2:11. On the eschatological use of σκηνή (booths or habitations), see Michaelis, TDNT 7:378–79. T. Schmidt 1987: 154–55 argues that the passage refers neither to alms nor to the generous use of money, but to a prudent person acting in a "critical impermanent situation with that which has been entrusted to him in order to gain lasting benefits." This may be the broad application if one had just this one verse, but the Lucan context suggests that using money generously is a central concern.

11 On lifting the eyes in prayer, see Mark 6:41; 7:34; John 11:41; 17:1; Ps. 123:1; 1 Esdr. 4:58 (in 1 Enoch 13.5 evil angels are too ashamed to look up); Jeremias, TDNT 1:185–86; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377 n. 11. Lifting the hands is a symbol of supplication in the NT; 1 Tim. 2:8. Στῆθος (breast) stands for the person; BAGD 767 and BAA 1532 ("the seat of the inner life"); elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 23:48; John 13:25; 21:20; Rev. 15:6. Jeremias 1963a: 141 at n. 46 says that in Judaism the heart is seen as the seat of sin, but cites as evidence only the late Eccles. Rab. 7.2.5 on 7:2.

9 "Leaders of the people" resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke's account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

32 Chrysostom's effort to interpret the sword as a reference to a slaughter knife fails; Michaelis, TDNT 4:524–27.

45 Dupont-Sommer 1973: 108; Michel and Betz 1960: 11–13, 15–17; Michel and Betz 1962–63. This usage also shows that a Hellenistic origin for the phrase is not required.

27 Fitzmyer 1981: 368 sees a purpose infinitive here; BDF §391.4 argues for result; Marshall 1978: 85 and Michel, TDNT 4:676, opt for a causal reference.

18 Michel, TDNT 5:129; Jeremias, TDNT 5:681 n. 184, 700; SB 4:213. Lohse, TDNT 8:481, cites the Jewish benediction; cf. also pp. 482, 485.

12 Acts 11:28; Michel, TDNT 5:157; P. Oxy. vol. 7 #1021 line 5; Fitzmyer 1981: 400. The remark may be rhetorical and partially hyperbolic (cf. Col. 1:6: “to the whole world”).

24 Michel, TDNT 8:94–105; M. Stern 1974: 330–34; Donahue 1971; Fitzmyer 1981: 469–70; Badian 1972. E. Sanders 1992: 146–69 notes that the tax system in Palestine was not more oppressive than in other regions. He estimates that taxes consumed somewhere between 20 percent and 30 percent of one’s income. For a more skeptical view that sees toll collectors as a symbolic representation of Jesus’ outreach to archetypal sinners, see Neale 1991: 110–15. I regard Neale’s dichotomy between symbolic representation and history as false for reasons made clear below. In this approach Neale follows Horsley 1987, and both underestimate the connections between John and Jesus in terms of audience. See also 5:29–32.

28 Michel, TDNT 8:98–99. The rate ranged from 2 percent to 10 percent in the empire itself. Josephus describes some tax decrees (Antiquities 14.10.5–6 §§200–209), explains the bidding for tax collection (Antiquities 12.4.3 §169), and mentions some exemptions (Antiquities 12.3.3 §143). See also 1 Macc. 10:26–31; 11:28, 34–36; 13:34 for exemptions and relief in an earlier period.

29 Michel, TDNT 8:102. In b. Sanh. 25a–b tax collectors appear with dice players and Sabbath breakers; m. Ned. 3.4 and m. B. Qam. 10.2 pair them with murderers and robbers; and m. Ṭohar. 7.6 says a tax collector who enters a house makes it unclean. One can see, in light of the historical setting, why the NT derogatory phrase toll collectors and sinners was so common.

16 Sasse, TDNT 3:888 §C3a; Michel, TDNT 5:158; Bovon 1989: 199 n. 35. Κ όσμος is found in Luke 9:25; 11:50; 12:30; and Acts 17:24.

34 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327; Michel, TDNT 8:104. On Jesus and table fellowship, see Stählin, TDNT 9:161.

9 All the parallels (Matt. 8:28 = Mark 5:2 = Luke 8:27) use this term; elsewhere at Matt. 28:9; Luke 14:31; Acts 16:16; and four times in John; Michel, TDNT 3:625–26.

35 On gathering as a figure of bringing together God's people, see Michel, TDNT 7:419–20, who also interprets the imagery as picturing a harvest. Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 10 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.457) reads: "Blessed are you, Lord, who gathers the dispersed of your people Israel."

37 See the intermingled metaphors in Matt. 9:35–38. On the image in general, see Michel, TDNT 7:418–20.

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

16 Michel, TDNT 5:131, suggests that to abandon one's home means "to leave family," since all the other examples are personal. It may, however, reflect Lucan abbreviation; see the next paragraph.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

6 For a methodological assessment of this debate, see R. Miller 1991. Sanders is unaware of Eppstein's 1964 article (see n. 1). Some in Judaism saw the temple as corrupt; 1 Enoch 89.73–90.29; 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.1–12. Meier 1994: 886 rightly calls the cleansing "prophetic action," but opts for a rejection of the temple rather than a cleansing. This ignores the connection to Isa. 56.

8 On the debate about 19:8, see Mitchell 1990, who argues for the view that Zacchaeus is defending his past behavior. On the other side, Hamm 1981 makes the case for repentance and conversion.

8 2 Chron. 7:1, 3 (concerning Solomon's offering at the temple's dedication); 2 Kings 1:10, 12, 14 (the fire sent by Elijah that consumed two companies of fifty men from Ahaziah in Samaria!); Miyoshi 1974: 13. 2 Kings 1:16–17 condemns some Samaritans' lack of faith in Yahweh and their turning to Baal-Zebub. The image of fire conceptually recalls the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:24–28).

15 Egelkraut 1976: 143, esp. n. 1; Miyoshi 1974: 59–61. For example, μετὰ ταῦτα occurs nine times in Luke–Acts, but not at all in Matthew and Mark (unless one counts the textually uncertain Mark 16:12). The use of ὁ κύριος (the Lord) in narrative introductions is Lucan; see the exegesis of Luke 2:11. The verb ἀναδείκνυμι (to appoint) appears only here and in Acts 1:24; Schlier, TDNT 2:30.

38 Satan's access to heaven is assumed in Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7. Fitzmyer 1985: 862 and Nolland 1993a: 563 are against the Isaianic allusion, but Luke's language suggests that passage. As an allusion it does not identify Isaiah's referent, since Isaiah probably refers to an earthly king who arrogantly takes on the role of a god and is cast down by God. In later Jewish thinking, the king correctly becomes typological of what Satan also does. The phrase overlapping with Isa. 14:12 is ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ (from heaven). For Jewish handling of Isa. 14, see Miyoshi 1974: 100; see especially T. Sol. 20.16–17, which pictures demons falling like lightning to earth.

44 Num. 21:6–9; Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; 1 Kings 12:11, 14 = 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Sir. 21:2; 39:30. Meanwhile, Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107) gives such power to Noah; Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231) attributes a power to judge to the "Omnipresent"; while T. Levi 18 gives such power to the messianic high priest. Miyoshi 1974: 102–5 has a full survey of the Jewish texts and regards Deut. 8:15 as key.

1 The best cases for this structure are made by Moessner 1983 and O'Toole 1987b. Moessner notes four basic approaches to the unit before making a case that much of the passage previews a "prophet like Moses" motif in the journey section of Luke. O'Toole correctly critiques Moessner as emphasizing the prophet too much at the expense of messianic categories, though for Luke the two concepts are very close, as Acts 3:13–26 shows.

26 For a comparison of conceptual parallels between 11:14–54 and 7:18–50, see Moessner 1989: 102–10, 115, who notes that Jesus' critique reflects teaching with roots in Deuteronomy.

13 While Acts 14:22 uses δεῖ to say that the disciples' suffering is also inevitable (Fitzmyer 1985: 1170), it does not speak of Jesus' suffering. For the view that the disciples' suffering in Luke–Acts mirrors Jesus', see Moessner 1990.

28 Moessner 1989: 127, 131, 176, 211 details this view. J. A. Sanders 1974 and C. A. Evans 1990: 166–69 tie the portrait to the themes of election and the true people of God. C. F. Evans 1955 is responsible for raising the connection to Deuteronomy and argues for it throughout his commentary (1990: 34–37, 435).

47 Of course, there are limits to this remark. The preferences one speaks about here are not in moral areas where God's desire is clear, as if people are free to do as they wish without awareness of the moral implications. For how this worked out practically in Jesus' confrontation with the Jewish leadership, see the insightful remarks of Manson 1949: 52–53, who replies to Montefiore's charge (1930: 103–4) that Jesus did not carry out his ethic in practice. Manson emphasizes Jesus' sense of disappointment and sorrow toward his enemies' rejection of him; in addition, Jesus' prophetic challenge shows his regard and concern for his enemies. Manson compares Jesus' relationship with his opponents to that of modern politicians who disagree vigorously in debate but respect one another as people.

21 Grässer 1960 contains a full treatment of this issue from this perspective. For a different, better approach to the same issue, see A. Moore 1966.

30 Marshall 1965–66: 347 and A. Moore 1966: 184–87 answer other objections to authenticity. Fitzmyer 1985: 1459 refuses to make a judgment on historicity, calling it impossible to reach a verdict. R. Brown 1994: 514–15 says that the conceptually parallel Mark 14:62 "may be close to the mindset and style of Jesus himself." Though he believes there is no way to determine this for certain (pp. 506–7), the remarks fit with authenticity. Brown even adds the argument that Mark's "you will see" statement is so ambiguous that it is unlikely to be created by the church.

13 Lev. 21:7, 14 discusses the laws regarding priestly marriages and restricts the priests to virgins (Marshall 1978: 52). SB 2:68–71 notes that this type of priestly union was encouraged; Plummer 1896: 9. For ancient Jewish rules of marriage, including reference to some Jewish texts after the first century, see G. Moore 1927–30: 2.119–22 and Safrai 1976a: 752–60.

12 This is a better way to look at the account than to argue that Simon is rude, insensitive, or uninterested (e.g., Morgan 1931: 103 calls Simon supercilious; Alford 1874: 510 speaks of Simon's disgust).

4 Morosco 1979 sees a discourse tradition but does not make clear whether it was tied to a formal commission or whether this material belongs to such a setting.

55 Moule 1953: 107. Bovon 1989: 77 argues that the predicate position is supported by the OT allusion to Isa. 4:3.

22 Liefeld 1984: 904 ties οὗ χάριν to λέγω (I say) so that the conjunctive phrase syntactically explains the reason of Jesus' reply, not the reason for forgiveness; Moule 1959: 147.

8 The grammar of the last phrase is difficult, but the idea is clear. For the options, see BDF §299.4, §360.4; BDR §299.4, §360.4; Moule 1959: 137, 187; Moulton and Howard 1929: 472. It is either a wish or an interjection that has Semitic roots.

8 The grammar of the last phrase is difficult, but the idea is clear. For the options, see BDF §299.4, §360.4; BDR §299.4, §360.4; Moule 1959: 137, 187; Moulton and Howard 1929: 472. It is either a wish or an interjection that has Semitic roots.

4 Fitzmyer gives four reasons why this view cannot work: (1) it cannot explain the presence of Moses and Elijah; (2) the verb ὁράω (to see; passive = to appear) is not limited to postresurrection events; (3) Jesus' glory is never mentioned in a resurrection account; and (4) the form does not match resurrection appearances. See also Bock 1987: 324 n. 98; H. Müller 1960: 60; Stein 1976.

16 The image of the sheep on the shoulder is common in the ancient world; Fitzmyer 1985: 1077; G. Wright 1939; V. Muller 1944.

27 For a defense of this position, see Murray 1953 and Hoehner 1987. For a defense of these grounds for divorce, but with no right to remarry, see Heth and Wenham 1984. Against a no-divorce-no-remarriage position stands Paul's reading of Jesus' command in 1 Cor. 7:12–16, which allows for divorce in the case of an unbeliever's desertion. Surely if Jesus' remarks were to be taken in the most strict sense, Paul would not have allowed this possibility, since an absolute view of a text such as Luke 16:18 apparently would have prohibited this option.

24 Michel, TDNT 8:94–105; M. Stern 1974: 330–34; Donahue 1971; Fitzmyer 1981: 469–70; Badian 1972. E. Sanders 1992: 146–69 notes that the tax system in Palestine was not more oppressive than in other regions. He estimates that taxes consumed somewhere between 20 percent and 30 percent of one's income. For a more skeptical view that sees toll collectors as a symbolic representation of Jesus' outreach to archetypal sinners, see Neale 1991: 110–15. I regard Neale's dichotomy between symbolic representation and history as false for reasons made clear below. In this approach Neale follows Horsley 1987, and both underestimate the connections between John and Jesus in terms of audience. See also 5:29–32.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

2 This issue is particularly acute if Matthew was the first Gospel, for Matthew's eschatological discourse not only has the Olivet remarks but also a series of graphic and theologically significant eschatological parables unique to his treatment. If Matthew is first and Luke knew him, why would Luke leave them out, since he loves parables, including eschatological parables (12:35–48; 18:1–8; 19:11–27)? Matthean prioritists have difficulty explaining this situation, which is a strong argument that Mark was written before Matthew. For how the various Synoptic theories approach this material, see the essays by C. M. Tuckett, F. Neirynck, and A. J. McNicol in Dungan 1990: 63–80, 108–24, 157–200.

2 Traces of Lucan expression are (1) the genitive absolute in 24:36, (2) the double participle phrase πτοηθέντες … καὶ ἔμφοβοι γενόμενοι (became terrified … and startled) in 24:37 (cf. 21:9; 24:5), (3) the verb ἐπιδίδωμι (to offer) in 24:42 (five times in Luke; twice in Matthew; none in Mark), and (4) the phrase ἐνώπιον αὐτῶν (in front of them) in 24:43 (in the Synoptics only here; 5:25; and 24:11). Nolland 1993b: 1210–11 notes that many apparently Lucan points also show up in John (perhaps pointing to a shared common source), but John's use does not seem to be driven by Luke's unique development of the passage (against Neirynck 1985). Nolland sees 24:41b–43 as Lucan expansion, but possibly based in tradition. His attempt to argue that "fish" in 24:42–43 corresponds to "bread" in 24:30 to make the larger unit is parallel to 9:13, 16 seems subtle and forced. If Luke created the detail, it is more likely that he would have combined bread and fish in a single scene.

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

7 On Fitzmyer's view, see the opening paragraph of the sources and historicity section. Bovon 1989: 202 also argues that the account depicts the victory of faith in the face of opposition. In his view only two texts parallel this account's point about refusing miracles as signs: Dan. 3 and Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231). But only the latter is really parallel in showing that one does not reveal signs to someone who is unworthy. On Jesus' resisting temptation or persevering in trial, see Luke 22:28; John 6:15, 26–34; 7:1–4; on his refusal to do signs, see Luke 22:39–46; Heb. 2:17–18; 4:15; 5:2. For the history of this text's exegesis, see Kö;ppen 1961.

17 On the role of purity in Judaism as a stage on the way to holiness, see Neusner and Chilton 1991; *m. Soṭa*9.15. On the Pharisees' concern for purity, see Witherington 1990: 56–59, who speaks in particular of the ḥăbērîm, the overly strict Pharisees.

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are "common people." He sees Jesus' offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with "common people," see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus' effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God's grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

45 Though the mishnaic text cites Hillel, rabbinic scholars dispute whether such attributions prior to A.D.. 70 are trustworthy. At the least, this tradition is old, even if it is not from Hillel; see Neusner 1984: 63–88.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

10 1 Cor. 11:5–6; Godet 1875: 1.358. Jeremias 1963a: 126 n. 57 notes that such action in later times could bring grounds for divorce; see *t. Soṭa*5.9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 3.168) and y. Giṭ. 50d (9.11) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 25.254).

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

32 Gen. 19; Deut. 29:23 [29:22 MT]; Isa. 1:9 (cited in Rom. 9:29); 3:9; 13:19; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:48–50; Amos 4:11; and Zeph. 2:9 show that Sodom was a symbol of the worst possible judgment; the NT texts are 2 Pet. 2:6–7 and Jude 7. Conceptually this Lucan passage is like the Lam. 4 text. So severely were Sodom and Gomorrah viewed in Judaism that some thought they would not even be raised to face final judgment (m. Sanh. 10.3; t. Sanh. 13.8 [= Neusner 1977–86: 4.240]).

44 Num. 21:6–9; Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; 1 Kings 12:11, 14 = 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Sir. 21:2; 39:30. Meanwhile, Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107) gives such power to Noah; Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231) attributes a power to judge to the "Omnipresent"; while T. Levi 18 gives such power to the messianic high priest. Miyoshi 1974: 102–5 has a full survey of the Jewish texts and regards Deut. 8:15 as key.

11 Washings took place before and after the meal. According to later tradition in the Talmud, only the washing after the meal was commanded by the Torah, the other was commanded by the rabbis; b. Ḥul. 105a. What is unclear is whether such rules applied to all meals or just to Sabbath and festival meals (y. Ber. 12a [8.2–3] [= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.284–91]); the real issue here is meals on the eve of Sabbath or at festival. E. Sanders 1990: 31 argues that there is no evidence of washing before every meal. Evidently the Pharisees' concern for contracting impurity from a dead swarming thing in liquid (Lev. 11:31–38) caused them to expand the biblical injunctions. But such a danger was not limited to the Sabbath or festal meals. As such, it is likely that such care was present at every meal. Booth 1986: 119–50, 194–203 cites t. Dem. 2.11–12 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.84) as key evidence.

12 The issue for some Jews was to avoid "fly-impurity," contact with a dead swarming thing from water, which if present, made the hands unclean. Just to be sure, the cup's outside and inside was washed; E. Sanders 1990:

29–42; t. Ber. 5.26 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.31). On Jewish cup tradition, see Maccoby 1982.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to "acts of mercy"; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, "My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures." The object of the last clause is not clear ("for heaven," "of benefits," "of souls," or "for myself in the world to come"), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

12 Jeremias 1963a: 177 calls them "the ipso facto beggars in the East." On this theme, see the later Jewish story of Bar Ma‹jan; y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.181–82).

8 In t. Menaḥ. 13.22 (= Neusner 1977–86: 5.162), the leadership's love of money and hatred of one another is why the temple came to be destroyed; also SB 1:937; 2:222; 4:336–39; Jeremias 1969: 49, 114. Luce 1933: 264 objects to this description, but fails to interact with the ancient sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 245 is right that a story about the afterlife would hardly be a meaningful rebuke to the Sadducees.

7 B. Ber. 28b matches the Pharisee's prayer, while b. Ber. 17a is more gracious in valuing the contribution that each person makes when attention is directed to God. In b. Suk. 45b a man states that if only one hundred are to be saved, he and his son will be among them; but if only two are saved, they will be he and his son; Ellis 1974: 214. In y. Ber. 7d (4.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.168) a rabbi give thanks that he is in the synagogue and not in the theater or circus.

6 On being worthy of a place in the future world, see b. Ber. 28b, 51a; y. Ber. 11d (7.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.276).

4 Judaism also had hopes of priestly messianic figures; see 1QS 9.11 and Neusner, Green, and Frerichs 1987.

6 On shame in ancient culture, see Malina and Neyrey 1991; on seating priority, see Neyrey 1991: 366.

7 The farewell discourse in John 14–17 is another distinct account involving this setting. For biblical and Greco-Roman parallels, see Kurz 1985 and Neyrey 1985: 5–48. Biblical and Jewish precedent for the discourse is found in Gen. 49 (Jacob's final address); Deut. 33 (Moses); Josh. 23 (Joshua); 1 Macc. 2:49–70 (Mattathias); Tob. 4:3–21 (Tobit); the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; and Josephus, Antiquities 4.8.1–48 §§176–322 (Moses).

15 Neyrey 1985: 24 sees Luke altering Matthew's more futuristic emphasis, a conclusion that depends on the questionable assumption that only one event is in view.

4 Several terms in this verse are used frequently by Luke (Neyrey 1985: 78; Marshall 1978: 855–56): ἱκανὸς χρόνος (a long time; Luke 8:27; 20:9; Acts 8:11; 14:3; 27:9) and γίνεται σημεῖον (a sign occurs; Acts 2:43; 4:16, 22, 30; 5:12; 8:13; 14:3).

31 John records four fulfillments of Scripture in Jesus' final hours: John 19:24 (Ps. 22:18 [22:19 MT]), John 19:28 (Ps. 22:15 [22:16 MT]), John 19:36 (Exod. 12:46), and John 19:37 (Zech. 12:10); Neyrey 1985: 147.

8 This stands in contrast to Prov. 11:26; Jer. 17:11; 1 Enoch 97.8–10. Sir. 11:18–19 is especially close to Jesus' picture, except that wealth comes through self-denial and diligence (lit., "from afflicting himself"), not simply fortune as in Luke. The LXX renders the key phrase "by his wariness and pinching," referring to frugality; Schweizer 1984: 207. Note also Ps. 49:16–20 [49:17–21 MT]; Plummer 1896: 323; Fitzmyer 1985: 972 (noting 1 Enoch 97.8–10, which rebukes unrighteous wealth); Nickelsburg 1978–79: 334–37. See n. 11 below for the Sirach and 1 Enoch texts.

5 On the parallelism between Luke 16 and 1 Enoch, see Nickelsburg 1978–79. These conceptual contacts show how Jesus' remarks fit a Jewish milieu.

14 Marshall 1978: 52; Schrenk, TDNT 2:189 §C2c (who notes Lucan parallels to the expression in Luke 2:25 and Acts 10:22). In addition, Schrenk notes NT parallels: Abel in Matt. 23:35; Lot in 2 Pet. 2:7–8; prophets in Matt. 13:17; 23:29; and martyrs in Matt. 23:35. The phrase has parallels in the OT (Deut. 6:25; 24:13; Ps. 106:31) and Judaism (Sus. 3; Sir. 44:17); Nolland 1989: 26.

31 See Klostermann 1929: 7 for more examples; Marshall 1978: 55 mentions 2 Macc. 3:22–40 as a parallel, where Heliodorus, chief minister to the governor of Syria, suffers a vision that prevents him from entering and defiling the temple. Nolland 1989: 29 suggests that the closest parallel is Dan. 8:17; 9:20–21; 10:7, 15.

4 This comparative-religions approach was very popular in the early part of the century. Numerous parallels have been noted, though none of them are exact. For a list of such parallels see Ernst 1977: 76 and Marshall 1978: 72–75, both of whom note the parallels and argue that such outside accounts are not the basis of this account (so also esp. Nolland 1989: 47). This is the current consensus, whatever else is said about the material. Machen 1930, though now dated, is the strongest critique against the comparative-religions approach.

8 Marshall 1978: 76. Marshall's discussion (pp. 72–77) of the question is the best brief treatment currently available, though it is not clear that a "birth secret" is present. Nolland 1989: 46–48 also defends a "traditional" view of historicity.

29 BDF §177, §233.2; BDR §177.1–2; Marshall 1978: 68; Klostermann 1929: 14. Luke 1:33 is the only use of the verb in the Gospels with reference to Jesus; K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:590. References to his "kingdom" are found in 22:30 and 23:42. Despite the absence of this term, regal reign imagery is found in several other terms and concepts, especially in Luke's use of Ps. 110:1 in Luke–Acts, as well as in the picture of Jesus' victory over Satan. In the OT, 2 Sam. 2:4 comes closest to this wording; Nolland 1989: 52.

17 Zerwick 1963: 85 §260; Wiefel 1988: 58. Nolland 1989: 69 also sees this as possible.

21 Schlier, TDNT 1:639–40. God's arm is also an image for the second exodus (Ezek. 20:33–34; Isa. 51:5, 9; 53:1); Nolland 1989: 71.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

4 The most detailed recent survey of the issues is Farris 1985: 26–30. Other treatments include R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Fitzmyer 1981: 376–78; Marshall 1978: 86–87; Ernst 1977: 92–94; Wiefel 1988: 62–64; Nolland 1989: 82–85; and Schürmann 1969: 84–85, 88–89, 93–94.

12 Friedrich, TDNT 6:835. Again, the Spirit serves as "testimony bearer" and "revelator"; Acts 2:17–18; 11:27; 13:1; 19:6; 21:9; Nolland 1989: 85. On the Lucan theme of the Spirit as the Spirit of prophecy, see Menzies 1991: 119–22.

29 Danker 1988: 48–49; Plummer 1896: 42; Hauck, TDNT 5:491 n. 24, 493. The combination is found elsewhere in Wis. 9:3 and Eph. 4:24. God seeks righteousness and worship even among the heathen: Acts 13:10, 16; 24:25; 10:35, 43; Schrenk, TDNT 2:199. In the OT, Josh. 24:14 is similar in thrust; Nolland 1989: 88.

36 Plummer does not cite anyone who argues for this option. "Knowledge of salvation" in Hebrew idiom refers to the experience of salvation; Ps. 98:2; Nolland 1989: 89.

40 Schlier, TDNT 1:352–53; Schürmann 1969: 92; BDB 855. When a plant is the image in the OT, a Davidite is in view; Nolland 1989: 90.

2 Major discussions can be found in Fitzmyer 1981: 392–93; R. Brown 1977: 411; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Creed 1930: 30–32; Schürmann

1969: 103–4, 108–9, 118–19; Marshall 1978: 96–97; Plummer 1896: 46; Nolland 1989: 98–103; and Ernst 1977: 99.

17 Fitzmyer 1981: 410 cites the formulas of praise or confession in Bar. 2:17–18; 1 Esdr. 9:8; 4 Macc. 1:12; Rom. 11:36; and Heb. 13:21. See also Schürmann 1969: 113. Nolland 1989: 108 mentions Ps. Sol. 18.10. The formula corresponds to the Semitic "Hosanna"; Lohse, TDNT 9:683, esp. n. 14.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

2 Bultmann 1963: 299, 304 regards this setting as artificial and erroneous, since the firstborn child is presented at the temple, which was not required by the law. Schürmann 1969: 119–20, 131 speaks of editorial work from Hellenistic Christianity, though he still insists that the bulk of the tradition is Jewish-Christian because of its heavy emphasis on Israel and its traces of a Palestinian setting (the only other verse he questions is 2:27). He places the origin in a setting similar to 1:5–25 and 1:57–79. Nolland 1989: 115 argues for Luke's hand in 2:22–24, 39; but the non-LXX form of the OT citation is against 2:22–24 being from Luke's hand. In Nolland's view (p. 116), the rest is substantially from a source, with 2:25, 38 serving as Lucan editorial links. He also sees possible Lucan elements in 2:33–35.

23 Marshall 1978: 120. Bovon 1989: 144 notes conceptual parallels in Ps. 31:19 [31:20 MT; 30:19 LXX] and Isa. 64:4–5 [64:3–4 MT]. Nolland

1989: 120 cites Bar. 4:24 and sees Isa. 52:10 as the key point of connection. Goulder 1989: 257 sees Isa. 40:1–5 as the key text.

33 John 19:25–27; Godet 1875: 1.141; Hendriksen 1978: 170–71; Marshall 1978: 123. Nolland 1989: 122 cites Ps. 22:20 [22:21 MT]; 37:15; Zech. 12:10; 13:7; and Ps. 37:15 as conceptual background.

34 Wiefel 1988: 80. These texts show that God used women as revelatory agents. Several texts, including Luke 2:36–38, have audiences that include both men and women. There is no indication in the Bible that prophetesses had a gender-restricted audience. In fact, the recording of their prophecies for all to read suggests the opposite. On Luke and women, see Flanagan 1978: 292–93, who notes thirteen Lucan texts where man and woman are paralleled as Simeon and Anna are here; Nolland 1989: 122.

4 Such a classification is also used for other sections of Luke 1–2. On such motifs in the Greco-Roman biographical tradition, see H. De Jonge 1977–78; Nolland 1989: 127; C. F. Evans 1990: 222–27. See n. 6 for the ancient texts.

5 Marshall 1978: 125–26. One can only note the restraint in this account compared to the apocryphal gospels. In contrast, the Jesus Seminar puts Jesus' saying in 2:49 in black type (meaning that it does not go back to Jesus); Funk and Hoover 1993: 275–76. They see the unit as Luke's production, drawing on the child-prodigy genre, the Lucan emphasis on design, and its lack of attestation elsewhere. But these criteria ignore the potential of a unique source surfacing in Luke's research and the evidence for the unit's origins in Palestinian settings (see the discussion above and n. 3). Its enigmatic expression also reflects Jesus' style (see also Nolland 1989: 127–28, who speaks less directly on the issue of historicity in 2:49). That this is the only use of δεῖ relating Jesus to the Father speaks against a Lucan origin. On the historicity of the entire scene, see the exegesis of 2:50.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

14 Creed 1930: 50; Nolland 1989: 141. Tiede 1988: 86 notes the emphasis this idea has in Acts (2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 8:22; 11:18; 17:30; 20:21; 26:20).

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

10 Fitzmyer 1981: 467; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672; Nolland 1989: 147. The image parallels the expression offspring of asps in the LXX: Isa. 11:8; 14:29; 30:6; 59:5.

7 Marshall 1978: 147; Scobie 1964: 73 n. 1. As Nolland 1989: 152 says, the argument "proves too much." Acts 19 shows people whose tie to Spirit hope is remote, not intimate.

2 Fitzmyer 1981: 497 rejects M. Johnson's verdict, noting that this alternative requires that Nathan son of David equal Nathan the prophet. Fitzmyer argues that there is no evidence of such an identification in pre-Christian Judaism or in the pre-Lucan Christian community. Zech. 12:12 is key here. Nolland 1989: 170, 172 agrees and argues that the line of Nathan is opened up by the curse on Jeconiah (Jer. 22:30), alternately called Jehoiachin (NIV) or Coniah (NRSV), which prompted Luke to ignore Jewish kings. Nolland does not emphasize a prophetic connection to Nathan. If this view is to be held, this is the way to argue for it.

1 Plummer 1896: 106; Manson 1949: 46 (who strongly defends this view); Dupont 1968: 97–115 (who argues for a middle course between literalism and parable); Carson 1984: 111; Nolland 1989: 177 (who defends the plausibility of Jesus' reporting this event to his disciples). On the other end of the spectrum apparently is Crossan (1991), who does not even discuss this event in his portrayal of Jesus. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 133–34 [Matt.], 278–80 [Luke]) places all the sayings of this unit in black type, thereby indicating rejection of a tie to Jesus. The consensus of the seminar is that the text is legendary, like Greco-Roman biography, and that the sayings were authored by Q following the LXX. The seminar calls it an "ordeal story," but this generic form category does not explain the explicit uniqueness of this confrontation account, a point that negates this argument. Manson 1949: 45–46 rightly challenges the description of the account as legendary (see the discussion of form below). LXX citations reflect only Luke's sensitivity to his Greek audience and are not evidence of the text's origin, since MT renderings would work (Nolland 1989: 177).

14 Glickman 1983: 226–27. Nolland 1989: 179 says that the test is exploitation of Jesus' privilege of sonship, since the Son has access to the powers of the Father. "Son of God" here has a special force for Jesus' unique filial relationship to God, since Jesus can access such power. But C. F. Evans 1990: 258 ties υἱός to 3:22, so that it means "servant of God" or "king." Nolland's view is more likely. Satan is not testing regal authority, but something more significant.

30 Satan's argument appears to be that "there should be no martyrs"; so Nolland 1989: 181.

32 The verb ἀφίστημι is used only by Luke in the Gospel tradition. Luke also loves to make temporal notes using ἄχρι: Luke 1:20; 17:27; 21:24; Acts 13:11; Nolland 1989: 182.

37 Dupont 1968: 58–59. So also Schulz 1972: 180, citing for the use of this verb Acts 2:16 and 13:40, which themselves may reflect traditional expressions. Nolland 1989: 181 gives the most plausible explanation: Jesus refuses to match γέγραπται, which the devil used in 4:10. The form εἴρηται does not appear elsewhere in the NT, which suggests a traditional use more than a Lucan change.

5 Nolland 1989: 186 notes the variety of phrases used to describe the Spirit's activity: 4:1, 14, 18; 5:17; 10:21.

9 Leaney 1958: 50–54. Schürmann 1969: 227–28, 241–42 says the source is Q; so also Busse 1978: 113–14 (though he sees Q's influence as more conceptual than verbal, which makes Luke very responsible for the account); Nolland 1989: 192.

24 Nolland 1989: 196 sees both ideas present, with the prophetic note dominant. This is a better way to see the passage, though whether the prophetic note is primary for Luke (as opposed to its use in the original setting) is questionable.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

35 Ps. 45:2 [44:3 LXX]; Col. 4:6; Acts 14:3; 20:32; Schürmann 1969: 234 n. 92. Nolland 1989: 198–99 argues that it refers to the cause of marvel: the words were endued with the power of God's grace. But this also is too positive, given their rejection.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

46 See the use of πορεύω in 4:42; 7:6, 11; 9:51, 52, 56, 57; 13:33; 17:11; 22:22, 39; 24:28; Fitzmyer 1981: 539; Ernst 1977: 174–75. "Jesus' hour had not yet come"; Nolland 1989: 201.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49;

Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

19 Ellis 1974: 100; Plummer 1896: 134. Compare Tob. 8:1–3; Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49 (where the reference is to the powers that Solomon—a regal figure—possessed over evil forces); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 85. Nolland 1989: 210 notes eight different methods that Jesus used in his various healings in Luke, all of which involve his word or personal touch.

26 Danker 1988: 112 (who calls it a demonic effect); Marshall 1978: 195; Creed 1930: 71; Nolland 1989: 211–12 (who speaks of the presence of "demonic force" as opposed to possession). On the idea of rebuke, see Luke 9:21, 42, 55 (other Lucan uses of ἐπιτιμάω are 4:41; 17:3; 18:15, 39; 19:39; 23:40).

31 Maurer, TDNT 8:161; Schrage, TDNT 8:288 n. 129; Lohse, TDNT 9:431–32 §C4. In the Marcan examples, this is often requested of Jesus; Nolland 1989: 213.

19 Does κατένευσαν refer to signaling with their heads or voices because their hands are busy, as Nolland 1989: 222 suggests? Cf. the use of signals in 1:62. Μέτοχος appears only here in the Gospels; Hanse, TDNT 2:831.

33 On Jewish views of forgiveness of sin, see Nolland 1989: 236, who notes key studies: Sjö;berg 1938; Thyen 1970; Gradwohl 1974; and Klauck 1981.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

3 Marshall 1978: 237 notes that Luke may have had an alternate list of the Twelve, but he regards the evidence as weak. Schürmann 1969: 318–19, 323 is confident that Luke had a form of what he calls the “Catalogue of the Apostles” (a name that notes the passage’s form), which differed from Mark and derived from Q. Bovon 1989: 278 also sees additional source material here beyond Mark, since the apostolic list had various forms, as Acts 1:13 shows. Nolland 1989: 265 speaks only of the influences of another tradition. Though he is less certain of another full list used by Luke, he thinks one existed because of the inclusion of Judas son of James and the absence of Thaddaeus. The differences in the lists will be noted in the exegesis.

4 Guenther 1985: 31. Nolland 1989: 265–68 has a full discussion, though he sees too much distance between Paul's and Luke's views when he argues that Luke limits the term ἀπόστολος to the Twelve. One of the ways that Luke indicates respect for Paul is by calling him an apostle in Acts 14:4, 14 and by showing that Paul does everything that Peter did as an apostle. Nolland decides that the Lucan use reflects a later title. The use of the phrase the Twelve as a fixed technical term in the earliest Christian material—even when the Twelve are not present (1 Cor. 15:5)—also speaks for the authenticity of ἀπόστολος here.

4 Guenther 1985: 31. Nolland 1989: 265–68 has a full discussion, though he sees too much distance between Paul's and Luke's views when he argues that Luke limits the term ἀπόστολος to the Twelve. One of the ways that Luke indicates respect for Paul is by calling him an apostle in Acts 14:4, 14 and by showing that Paul does everything that Peter did as an apostle. Nolland decides that the Lucan use reflects a later title. The use of the phrase the Twelve as a fixed technical term in the earliest Christian material—even when the Twelve are not present (1 Cor. 15:5)—also speaks for the authenticity of ἀπόστολος here.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

11 The closest possibility is the comparison with the priesthood in Hebrews, but here only Jesus is noted. Ellis 1974: 112 accepts the Mosaic imagery but not the Aaronic; Marshall 1978: 241 regards the Mosaic picture as possible; Nolland 1989: 275 argues persuasively against it. Nolland notes that the OT texts are a call to keep people away from the mountain (e.g., Exod. 19:12) and that the OT mountain setting is not related to teaching.

41 This kind of result is evidence of the remark's rhetorical form. On the variety of applications of this teaching in the NT, see Nolland 1989: 297; Acts 8:2; 9:25; 14:5–6; 22:25; 25:10–12; John 18:22–23. In Acts 22:25 and 25:10–12 Paul seeks legal protection against the unrighteous as he continues to minister. Acts 23:2–3 shows a retaliation for which Paul apologizes (23:5). Acts 4:24–31 shows how the church applied this truth.

58 For κατανοέω, see Luke 12:24, 27; 20:23; Acts 11:6; Plummer 1896: 191. Nolland 1989: 307 argues that the force is that one should attend to nonjudgment and love of the enemy, not ethical minutiae. This is correct contextually, but the remark is so proverbial that the application is broader. Sin in general is in view.

11 On the authority of Jesus' word, see Matt. 7:29; 8:8; Luke 5:5; Mark 1:25–26; 4:39; Kittel, TDNT 4:107. On cures from afar, see the texts frequently discussed with this one: Matt. 8:8, 13; John 4:50–52; Lohse, TDNT 9:432. Ps. 107:20 stresses healing by a word; Nolland 1989: 317.

6 Jeremias, TDNT 6:921. No archeological remains of a gate or of the city wall have yet been found; Nolland 1989: 322.

20 It is likely that μικρότερος is to be taken as a superlative. BDF (§60, §244) discusses the construction, but does not mention this verse. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 erroneously attributes this form of the remark to the early church; see the introduction to 7:18–35. The blessedness of the μικρότερος is frequent in the NT: Matt. 10:42; 18:10, 14; Mark 9:42; Luke 9:48; Nolland 1989: 337.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

36 On “wisdom’s children,” see Sir. 4:11; Prov. 8:32–33. On wisdom personified, see Prov. 1:20–33; 8:1–9:6; 1 Enoch 42; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:10; Wis. 7:22–11:1; Schürmann 1969: 427; Nolland 1989: 346.

2 For a good summary of the critical discussion, see Nolland 1989: 351–53, who relies on the approaches of Legault 1954, Lö;ning 1971, and Dupont 1980. Nolland also rightly rejects Brodie’s midrashic reading (1983) of this text as an internalization of 2 Kings 4:1–37. The points of connection between 2 Kings 4 and Luke 7 are too general to be compelling. In addition, the function of oil in the two accounts is too different (2 Kings 4:3–7 versus Luke 7:37–38), and the bowing of the Shunammite in 2 Kings 4:37 is a natural expression of respect, not unlike Luke 5:8. Luke 7:37–38 is filled with emotion, a background that 2 Kings 4 lacks.

3 Bultmann 1963: 20–21 places the discussion in the section on apophthegms and controversy dialogues. He sees 7:48–50 as added later, so that the original key to the passage was 7:47. He also sees the account as a doublet for Mark 14:3–9. Fitzmyer 1981: 686–87 sees the parable inserted into the pronouncement story. The dubious assumption here is that an account cannot mix forms. The argument fails, since without the parable the Pharisee's concerns in 7:39 remain unanswered; Nolland 1989: 351–52. Nolland prefers to call the passage "legend" since it is an example account, but he notes that doing so does not prejudice the account's historicity. Berger 1984: 51–56, 256, 361 speaks of parable and dialogue side by side, and calls the account an apologetic defense of Jesus' attitude toward sinners.

15 Gen. 26:12 speaks of Isaac's hundredfold yield, but that text has no clear connection to Luke. It is debated whether this is a normal or exaggerated yield; Nolland 1989: 371–72 opts for a high yield. On the ancient custom of measuring a yield twice, see Song Rab. 7.3.3 on 7:3. Normal yields ranged from sevenfold to tenfold (Schürmann 1969: 454 n. 78), so that a hundredfold return is exceptional.

8 The addition of the missionary emphasis at the end is called secondary on the assumption that multiple forms are not in the original tradition. But most now see that the tradition did reach Mark already in this form. This is an example against the supposed rule, which raises questions about the rule! But for development, see Kertelge 1970: 107. Another key study of this event also seeing stages in the development of the account is Pesch 1972; an earlier English version is Pesch 1971. However, Nolland 1989: 404 rightly sees the double purpose tied to the influence of eyewitness memory, an observation that applies to many fixed-form accounts. The appeal to major stages of development is not necessary.

32 So Cranfield 1959: 176. Plummer 1896: 227 speaks of Kersa, a locale near the lake, but he rejects Origen's association of it with Gergesa. Arndt 1956: 239–40 and Bovon 1989: 434 accept Gergesa as original in Luke. Liefeld 1984: 914–15 is rightly cautious about a solution, as is Nolland 1989: 407. No clearly superior option exists between reading a regional reference or concluding that Gergesa is intended.

11 Num. 32:41; Judg. 10:3; Arndt 1956: 246. Fitzmyer 1981: 745 notes other uses of the name in the first century. Nolland 1989: 419 notes that if the name has Aramaic roots (יָעִיר, Jair), then it means "he [God] will awaken" (1 Chron. 20:5).

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as "legendary." He suggests a cure by "auto-suggestion," a rationalistic description that rejects the account's portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of "grace" as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

32 Van Der Loos 1965: 572 cites OT precedent (Judg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 30:12); more correct is Schneider 1977a: 199. In Judaism, see 1 Enoch 22.1–14; 39.4–8. Nolland 1989: 422 notes a possible contact with 1 Kings 17:21–22.

3 Schramm 1971: 139–40 also sees another source. Matthean prioritists see Luke working with Matthew and must speak of Marcan expansion. Schneider 1977a: 218 is against another source, but Nolland 1993a: 506 regards it as possible. Nolland (pp. 506–8) also details the scholarly treatment of the parallel in Mark.

3 Bayer 1986: 193–94. Appealing to possible oral tradition, Marshall 1978: 394 more cautiously notes that μέλλει reflects an Aramaic participle and thus perhaps the saying's ancient form. Colpe, TDNT 8:444, speaks of a possible "unabbreviated special tradition," though he also sees the church developing this tradition. Fitzmyer 1981: 812 sees Luke's dependence only on Mark, though he has trouble explaining Luke's abbreviated prediction. Bayer 1986: 197 makes a good case against the Lucan short form as the original form, arguing that Luke has abbreviated the tradition. Against a second source is Nolland 1993a: 512.

4 Note the passive progressive construction: ἦν παρακεκαλυμμένον (was being hidden). Marshall 1978: 394 notes that this construction with ἀπό (from) is a Hebraism; Ezek. 22:26; BDF §155.3. Citing Exod. 7:13–14 ("Pharaoh's heart was hardened"), Tiede 1988: 193 argues that the passive is ambiguous about the concealer's identity. Such remarks are usually tied to God's sovereignty (1 Cor. 1:30; 2:6–9). Regardless, the implication is that such concealment can be overturned only by attention to God's message. Nolland 1993a: 514 holds out the possibility of Satanic binding, noting that by 24:25 the disciples are seen as responsible for failing to understand. Nolland may be right.

2 Schürer 1890: 105–43. The recent revision of Schürer's work (1973–87: 1.399–427) changes little of the original discussion. Schürer summarizes what was already an old debate, going back at least to Strauss 1972: 152–56 (originally 1835), as noted by Nolland 1989: 99.

15 Dessau 1892–1916: #918; Dessau 1921. Another relevant inscription on Quirinius is Dessau 1892–1916: #2683, which describes his career in Syria; Nolland 1989: 100.

1 On NT structures with the use of "seven," see Rengstorf, TDNT 2:632 §B4d. On other points of Lucan structure, see Nolland 1989: 168 and Goulder 1989: 283–90.

2 Because the exact list of names is so uncertain and because Luke says nothing about the structure, one should be cautious about invoking such precise symbolism. Wiefel 1988: 97 seems to regard this twelfth-week view as possible. Schürmann 1969: 203 n. 119 argues that if it is present Luke is not conscious of it. Nolland 1989: 168 suggests that it was the point of Luke's source, whose order he reversed. But how can one know this? Goulder 1989: 284–85 is strongly supportive of this view, citing 1 Enoch 93.3–10 to stress that the form is to some extent artificial.

10 The twentieth-century English Duke of Windsor, Edward VIII, is a classic, similar contemporary illustration of this truth, though he had no children. A closer analogy would be William's becoming king in place of his father, if Charles were to become disqualified for the throne. So then, Luke did not need Nathan to make this point (Nolland 1989: 170, 172, who is for the influence of the Jeconian curse on Luke, so that the evangelist sends the genealogy through Nathan rather than through Solomon).

9 Talbert 1982: 111–12 sees chiasmus in 9:51–19:44, but has to omit Luke 15 and place 14:1–6 out of its Lucan order! Goulder 1964: 196 argues for the following chiastic links:

10:25	eternal life
11:1	prayer
11:14	healing
11:37	pharisaic hypocrisy
12:1	money
12:35	repentance
13:10	rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts
14:1	rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts
15:1	repentance
16:1	money
16:14	pharisaic hypocrisy
17:11	healing
17:5	prayer
18:18	eternal life

The most plausible case for chiasmus is made by Farrell 1986. Blomberg also deals with and rejects theories that make the central section a Christian Deuteronomy; see C. F. Evans 1955. My main criticism of Blomberg's article is that it regards the section's end as falling at 18:34, ignoring later literary clues that Jesus has not arrived in Jerusalem (19:28, 41). This may be the Achilles' heel against his theory that the section's parable source was laid out chiastically, especially if 19:11–27 is taken into consideration. Still, aspects of Blomberg's case and the general outline of a possible Lucan source may surface in my discussion; see also Nolland 1993a: 530–31.

9 Plummer 1896: 264 notes that Luke makes nothing of this nickname. Marshall 1978: 406 rejects the suggestion of the nickname's connection with this incident, noting that the name is absent and that it is not likely that Jesus would give them a derogatory nickname. In addition, Mark 3:17 does not say that the name came from Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 536 notes that the concern of James and John in Mark 10:35–45 also revolves around power. But disciples are to serve. The nickname may allude to their character, which is undergoing reformation.

10 The aorist participle στραφείς and the aorist verb ἐπετίμησεν suggest either a simultaneous action or a turning followed by the rebuke. Jesus responds similarly in Luke 22:47–51; Nolland 1993a: 537.

14 On the use of ἕτερος (another), see the additional note on Luke 7:19. If 22:35 indicates a connection to this mission, then the seventy-two disciples appointed for this mission served alongside the Twelve, who had already been commissioned (also Nolland 1993a: 550).

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

30 Schweizer 1984: 176 notes that the force is spatial. Marshall 1978: 422 notes that in 11:20, which uses a different term, φθάνω, Luke clearly means "arrived." On the relationship between ἐγγίζω and φθάνω, see Fitzer, TDNT 9:89, esp. n. 10. Does 10:9 say the same thing as 11:20? It most likely does. Marshall does not think the spatial argument is as key as the argument of 11:20. For a full defense of the kingdom declared as arrived in this verse, see Bock 1992c. For the debate over the Aramaic behind the sayings and the difficulty of determining it, see Meier 1994: 432–34, 486–87. Luke's ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (upon you) is missing in the Matthean parallel and may represent his explanation of the sayings' force. The present effects of the kingdom are clearly in view (10:23–24; Nolland 1993a: 554). Schürmann 1994: 74 cites 7:28; 16:16; and 17:20–21 as conceptually parallel.

38 Satan's access to heaven is assumed in Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7. Fitzmyer 1985: 862 and Nolland 1993a: 563 are against the Isaianic allusion, but Luke's language suggests that passage. As an allusion it does not identify Isaiah's referent, since Isaiah probably refers to an earthly king who arrogantly takes on the role of a god and is cast down by God. In later Jewish thinking, the king correctly becomes typological of what Satan also does. The phrase overlapping with Isa. 14:12 is ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ (from heaven). For Jewish handling of Isa. 14, see Miyoshi 1974: 100; see especially T. Sol. 20.16–17, which pictures demons falling like lightning to earth.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark.

Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

11 There is debate about the age of these sections of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and, as a result, whether they reflect the Judaism of Jesus' period. Fitzmyer 1985: 879 questions their value, while Derrett 1970: 225 n. 5 holds that this uncertainty is insufficient to reject the presence of these ideas in this time. Nolland 1993a: 580–82 argues that the theme has Jewish roots, but that Jesus gives more focus to these two laws being the center of godliness. In Luke, the lawyer has such insight as well. Would the early church put such a reply in the lips of a Jewish lawyer? Nolland rightly rejects insistence on a Hellenistic background (against Schürmann 1994: 135, who speaks of piety toward God and righteousness toward others), but it must be noted that nowhere in Judaism do Deut. 6 and Lev. 19 appear explicitly side by side. See also the additional note.

14 Manson 1949: 262 notes both Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §474, who describes the region's barren character, and Jerome, who observes that Arab robbers were frequent on this route in his day some four centuries after Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 593 adds to the list Strabo 16.2.40–41 (c763), who mentions Pompey's problem with robbers and then describes the city.

16 On priestly uncleanness, see Lev. 21:1; on priests' being excused from helping sinners, see Sir. 12:4–6 and Midr. Sam. 5 §9 (31a). Nolland 1993a: 593 adds Num. 5:2; 19:2–13; Ezek. 44:25–27 to the list of texts on uncleanness, but rightly refuses to name these as a motive in the parable.

5 Marshall 1978: 455 sees either two versions or Matthew's adding to an original short edition like that in Luke. These reflect distinct recensions of Q; but he does not discuss the number of events. Jeremias 1971a: 193–96 argues for the originality of the Lucan form and posits an Aramaic form behind it. He regards its structure as memorable in an oral context, carrying rhyme and a two-four rhythm (so also Meier 1994: 293). Beasley-Murray 1986: 147 argues that Luke's version is original in extent, but that Matthew's is closer to the original wording, a view close to Nolland's (noted above). For him Luke's prayer circulated in Gentile Christian circles, while Matthew's was the Jewish-Christian version. Nevertheless, for him the prayer's roots go back to Jesus. Wiefel 1988: 215 is less certain of this attempt to distinguish communities.

12 Nolland 1993a: 637 adds other signs like turning back the sun (2 Kings 20:8–11) or providing manna like Moses (cf. Luke 9:12–17). SB 1:726–27 discusses this category in later rabbinic writings.

17 The phrase οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν refers to "your own people" (Arndt 1956: 300), although most see it as referring to the "sons of the Pharisees" (Rengstorf, TDNT 4:443) or more broadly to "countrymen" (Godet 1875: 2.64) (see BAGD 833 §1cα; BAA 1663 §1cα; Heb. 12:5; 1 Pet. 5:13). Nolland 1993a: 639 states the question this way: "What will other Jewish exorcists, in light of their own exorcizing activity, make of such a view?" For a different (and I think more preferable) view, see n. 19 below.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson 1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like "hand of God" (1:66) and "arm of God" (1:51).

25 See BAGD 856 §2 and BAA 1708 §2. With ἐπί, φθάνω means “to overtake.” Appeals to the ability of ἐπί to mean “near” (as in John 21:1) are not good enough to refute the force of the verb-preposition combination. In the LXX, φθάνω normally means “to reach, arrive, happen to.” When combined with ἐπί in the LXX, it means for something to reach someone; Dan. 4:24, 28 [Theodotion]. Caragounis’s appeal (1989: 20–23) to the proleptic aorist here fails (even though he sees a fulfillment with resurrection); see also Nolland 1993a: 640.

31 “House” is probably the meaning of αὐλή here (BAGD 121 §2, §4 and BAA 243 §2, §4), but the different term suggests once again the possibility of a distinct source. Nolland 1993a: 641 argues against a distinct source for Luke because of the presence of Lucan vocabulary (Luke’s version has more intense imagery for a battle scene). Αὐλή has the meaning “palace” in 1 Macc. 11:46; 3 Macc. 2:27; 5:46; Matt. 26:3; Mark 15:16.

1 Most argue for Q: Fitzmyer 1985: 953 (12:1 from L), 956 (12:2–9 from Q), 962–63 (12:10 from Q or Mark; 12:11–12 from Q); Ernst 1977: 392 (for 12:2–9); and Schneider 1977a: 277. Grundmann 1963: 252 says it is “probably” Q. Marshall 1978: 510 speaks of Q material conflated with Marcan elements and also argues that Q has various recensions and that Luke’s version is slightly different from that of Matthew. Nolland 1993a: 675–76 sees Q for 12:2–9 and a mixture of Q and Mark for 12:10–12.

9 There is no need to suggest that Luke corrected Matthew’s pricing, as Nolland 1993a: 678 intimates.

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 987 speaks of elements going back to Jesus that focus on God’s final vindicating judgment. This approach may be too broad in ignoring the Son of Man–Jesus linkage, about whose secondary character Fitzmyer is uncertain. Nolland 1993a: 700 accepts all the material as authentic except 12:42, 46c, 47–48. Though some Lucan summary touches exist (e.g., 12:41–42a), all of the material, including Peter's question, coheres with Jesus' teaching. For a defense of the traditional roots of 12:41, see D. Wenham 1984: 57–62.

25 Note the possible views mentioned in the exegesis of 12:41. The Matthean parallel of the hypocrite is enlightening, since a "play-actor" is addressed by ὑποκριτής; BAGD 845; BAA 1684. The term may well be Matthew's rendering, since he uses it seven times uniquely (Schneider 1975: 26 n. 14; Nolland 1993a: 704). Marshall 1978: 544 notes that Aramaic הנפא (hnp,) can be translated with the sense that appears in each version of the account. On false teachers, see esp. 2 Pet. 2:1–2, 13–14, 17–22.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

23 Πράκτωρ does not imply a Hellenistic setting, since such prisons were widespread. Those who see a Roman figure in view and thus a Hellenistic setting distinguish this term from ὑπηρέτης (servant) in Matt. 5:25. Nolland 1993a: 714 speaks of Luke's careful choice of terms here.

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression "Palestinian."

13 Deut. 22:9; Judg. 9:7–15; 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; 2 Kings 18:31; SB 1:872–73 §g; Marshall 1978: 555. On fig trees and vineyards, see Pliny, Natural History 17.35 §200 and Nolland 1993a: 718. Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum 3.10.6, advises against mixing figs and vines.

5 Luke 5:15; 8:2; 11:14; 13:12; Matt. 8:17. Demonic influence may be a better description than demonic possession, because it is not behavior but a diseased condition that is the point; Luke 4:33, 38–39; 2 Cor. 12:7. Weakness is produced by the evil spirit; 1QapGen 20.17, 21–29; Stählin, TDNT 1:493; Marshall 1978: 557. Fitzmyer 1985: 1012 calls the genitival ἀσθενείας (weakness) an Aramaism; see Creed 1930: 183. Nolland 1993a: 724 suggests that the number eighteen may be conventional (2 x 9 = "a long time"); Judg. 3:13–14; 10:8; 20:25, 44; 2 Sam. 8:13. This is possible, but not certain.

12 On the synagogue leader (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), see Schrage, TDNT 7:847. This person was responsible for the order and progress of worship, so he is the right one to speak. The most learned member presents the official view on Jesus' act. There is no need to argue for a redactional seam at the shift of address to the audience. The leader is responsible for the assembly's worship (Nolland 1993a: 724). Nolland argues that "the directive fits only imperfectly in the flow of the story." I disagree: practice and custom is the issue here. The issue cannot arise until Jesus heals.

10 Σάτον occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 13:33; BAGD 745; BAA 1490; also in Josephus, Antiquities 9.4.4 §71; 9.4.5 §85; Gen. 18:6; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24. Nolland 1993a: 730 questions this connection, since the LXX does not connect σάτον to סְאָה. If he is right, the amount is unclear. But a Semitic context for the parable makes a specific connection likely.

2 Marshall 1978: 563 also leans toward independence for the door imagery, though he sees elements of connection with the tradition in the rest of the passage and sees Luke bringing some elements of this material together. Fitzmyer 1985: 1021–22 sees a Lucan hand in most of the material and sees only 13:24–29 as Q material, though he acknowledges that the case is not certain. Nolland 1993a: 732 attributes 13:22–23 to Luke and the rest mainly to traditional roots, most shared with Matthew. Most argue that the theme of presence or entry of blessing brought the texts together (Meier 1994: 310) and that Luke rearranged 13:28–29 by placing what was at the end at the start of the saying. Meier 1994: 311 lists the Lucan order of Matthean elements as 9, 10, 4, 5, 6, 7, 2, 3, 5, with four Lucan redactional stichs. It is more credible, however, to see a fresh tradition, given all the restructuring required of the alternative.

9 Ἀγωνίζομαι suggests intense effort or straining labor; BAGD 15; BAA 27. With the present tense it contextually denotes continual striving. This is the only use of the word in the Synoptics; elsewhere at John 18:36; 1 Cor. 9:25; Col. 1:29; 4:12; 1 Tim. 4:10; 6:12; 2 Tim. 4:7. It is a term of Hellenistic, Jewish, and early Christian exhortation; Nolland 1993a: 733; Hoffmann 1967: 196.

2 See Borg 1987: 162–63, 170, who notes Jer. 12:7 and Ezek. 11:22–23. So also Horsley 1987: 300–302, who calls Luke 13:32–33 part of a "fairly solid tradition" (p. 190). For the debate on 13:31–33, see Nolland 1993a: 738–39, who accepts 13:31–32, but regards 13:33 as a Lucan redaction that makes the transition from 13:32 to 13:34. However, the use of δεῖ is too widespread in the Gospel tradition to make this conclusion solid (see the exegesis of 13:33). In addition, as Marshall 1978: 570 suggests, 13:33 is an integral link to 13:32.

3 Interestingly, Nolland 1993a: 739 argues that both Matthew and Luke selected the location for this tradition in their respective Gospels.

12 Bultmann 1963: 114 sees wisdom here. Leaney 1958: 210 cites Matt. 23:34; Luke 2:40, 52; 7:35; 11:31, 49 as parallels. See also 1 Enoch 42. Luke 11:49–51 uses the wisdom motif openly. For more reasons not to see wisdom here, see Bock 1987: 120. Marshall 1978: 573–74 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1034 opt for wisdom terminology, but without Jesus alluding to himself as wisdom, since Jesus sees himself as wisdom's messenger. Sir. 24:7–12 provides a plausible background. If wisdom is in the background, this is the best way to argue for it. Nolland 1993a: 739 questions the presence of wisdom here, as do I.

5 See C. Kim 1975 for an ancient invitation. Fitzmyer 1985: 1055 correctly notes that Jeremias's appeal to this as a custom of Jerusalem has only a fifth-century text as support, but Esther and Philo suggest that the custom is possibly older. Nolland 1993a: 755 adds Terence, Self-Tormentor 169–70, and Apuleius, Metamorphoses (Golden Ass) 3.12, which may suggest that more than Jewish custom is in view here.

19 Thackeray 1912–13 discusses an idiom ("surrender unconditionally") possibly found in the greetings in Judg. 18:15; 1 Sam. 10:4; 17:22; 25:5; 30:21; T. Judah 9.7. But this force is less clearly documented; see Nolland 1993a: 764.

24 The verb μωρανθῇ literally means for salt "to become foolish," a personification that shows its total lack of value because it is no longer salty; BAGD 531 §2; BAA 1075 §2. There may be a wordplay on the Semitic תפל (tpl), which can mean "to be foolish" or "to be unsavory"; Job 1:22; Jer. 23:13; Marshall 1978: 595; Black 1967: 166; Schwarz 1978. Nolland 1993a: 765 notes that the figure is based on the result of salt losing its saltiness, regardless of whether it actually happens.

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

3 For effective refutation, see O'Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O'Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the "lostness" of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

8 Sir. 33:20 (NRSV) reads: "To son or wife, to brother or friend, / do not give power over yourself, as long as you live; / and do not give your property to another, / in case you change your mind and must ask for it." A more positive attitude and example appears in Tob. 8:21 (Nolland 1993a: 782).

15 Κεράτιον (little horn) was eaten only by the poorest humans; BAGD 429; BAA 873; a NT hapax legomenon. Marshall 1978: 609 cites a saying from Lev. Rab. 35.6 on 26:3: "When the Israelites are reduced to carob pods, then they repent." This food was nicknamed "John the Baptist's bread," on the erroneous idea that John ate carobs. John's carob was sweet, while this carob was bitter; Nolland 1993a: 783; Bailey 1976: 171–73.

24 Bailey argues that this omission of his resolve to be a worker is key: the son backs off from his confession and is disappointed that his effort to earn back his relationship, a picture of his “rabbinic-like repentance,” has failed. Bailey is right that the son understands that the father “gifted” him with a new relationship, but his characterization of the son is too negative, as Nolland 1993a: 784 correctly notes. The parable describes a returned prodigal, a sinner found, which for Jesus is a positive, not a conniving, category.

4 Mark also lacks the exception; Wiefel 1988: 294 therefore speaks of Mark as Luke’s source. The variation in the tradition is what causes the Jesus Seminar’s uncertainty about the saying. But only the exception should be a topic for such a discussion. Against a Matthean redaction is the probable Semitic background to the exception as stated in Matt. 5:32 (noted in Nolland 1993a: 816, although curiously he sees the detail as a redactional addition).

23 The penalty was apparently never carried out in Jesus’ time since Jews did not have the right to execute capital punishment under Roman rule; Creed 1930: 208. The idea of such punishment still remains, as Jub. 30.8–9 shows. The standard was to pursue holiness. Such an act of adultery rendered a woman defiled (Jub. 33.9; m. Sot\;a 2.6; 5.1). In fact, these Mishnah texts almost require divorce for the adulterous wife since she becomes unclean to the husband. Thus, adultery was seen as extremely serious in Judaism (on the Greco-Roman view of adultery tied to shame, see Nolland 1993a: 818).

5 On the use of φωνή (voice), see Luke 11:27; Acts 4:24; Gen. 39:15, 18; Judg. 21:2; 1 Sam. 11:4; Van Der Loos 1965: 496 n. 4; Klostermann 1929: 173. The call for mercy is also used in the Psalter (e.g., 109:21; Glö;ckner 1983: 139–40), but not much can be made of this general expression, as Nolland 1993a: 846 indicates.

21 Marshall 1978: 664 and Plummer 1896: 409 deny the idea of escape, arguing that the point is a prohibition against coming down to collect possessions; but are the two points mutually exclusive? The comparison with Lot's wife in 17:32 suggests an escape. Nolland 1993a: 861 argues that part of the point is a willingness to flee and leave one's possessions behind, which reinforces earlier teaching about how riches can ensnare their possessor.

22 For δῶμα, see BAGD 210; BAA 423; Luke 5:19; 12:3; Josh. 2:6, 8; 2 Sam. 16:22; Isa. 22:1. The flat roof was probably used as living space (Acts 10:9; Nolland 1993a: 861).

7 The order of commandments in Matthew and Mark follows the MT and manuscript A of the LXX. Luke's order finds ancient precedent in Philo, On the Decalogue 12 §51; manuscript B of Deut. 5 LXX; as well as NT parallels in Rom. 13:9 and James 2:11; Nolland 1993a: 886.

11 Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§42–49, mentions the healing skill of Solomon, thus providing a base for this description of David's son. This view is contrary to Nolland 1993b: 900, who argues against a Jewish expectation of a Davidic healer. His point is correct, but these traditions raise the question of what connections Jesus' acts of healing might surface. With all the eschatological ferment in Palestine in this period, why deny the possibility of such reflection on such events? Meier 1994: 689 is certainly correct to see the connection as not surprising in this setting.

6 Fitzmyer 1985: 1224 sees this as the wrong question to ask, since the text does not address the issue. Klostermann 1929: 185 simply says that supernatural knowledge is not expressed by Luke. Luce 1933: 292 takes a rationalistic approach: Jesus inquired about his name, but Luke portrays his knowledge as supernatural. Nolland 1993b: 905 speaks of Jesus' "uncanny knowledge."

21 Jeremias 1963a: 62 holds that Jesus' audience interrupted him; so also Plummer 1896: 442, who argues that the crowd thinks Jesus is spoiling the parable; so also Nolland 1993b: 916–17. Klostermann 1929: 189; Marshall 1978: 708; and Danker 1988: 309 hold that the interruption comes from attendants in the parable. If 19:26–27 maintains the parabolic perspective, and 19:27 looks as if it does, then those who react here come from within the parable and comment as a crowd to the king. Of course, since the king represents Jesus, there is no real difference in sense in the choice. If Jesus speaks, he simply gives the parable's lesson.

2 Catchpole 1984 argues against historicity on form-critical grounds. For a response, see Witherington 1990: 104–7 and Nolland 1993b: 922–23. Holding to historicity, Kinman 1993 argues for a contrast between this event and Greco-Roman entries of dignitaries. Kinman also argues that Luke tries to show Jesus as a "king like Solomon" who is not a political threat and thus seeks to blunt the charge that Christians are a political threat to Rome. As such, Luke declares the significance to the event by how he tells the whole story of Jesus.

7 Nolland 1993b: 925 rejects the influence of this custom, preferring to read the authority as a uniquely christological portrayal versus a cultural

one. Are such issues either/or choices?

10 Luke uses ἄγω (to bring) thirteen times (Luke 4:1, 9, 29, 40; 10:34; 18:40; 19:27, 30, 35; 22:54; 23:1, 32; 24:21), while Mark uses it only three times (Mark 1:38; 13:11; 14:42) and Matthew four times (Matt. 10:18; 21:2, 7; 26:46). Mark uses φέρω (to bring along) fifteen times compared to Matthew's and Luke's four times each. This difference is one of Marcan style. Fitzmyer 1985: 1249 argues that Matthew and Luke chose the more precise verb. Luke's reading leaves a chiasmus in the verse: "finding the bound donkey … loosing it and bring it" (Nolland 1993b: 924).

20 Giblin 1985: 56 sees Ps. 137:9; Ezek. 4:1–2; and Isa. 3:26 as relevant. He notes that Jerusalem falls as any worldly city would because they missed the "moment of truth." See also Flückiger 1972: 387–88. Nolland 1993b: 931–32 notes the numerous examples of non-Lucan language in Luke 19:43–44.

5 The temple area was large (over 100 yards by 150 yards), so if Jesus acted quickly, there may have been little time to react. In addition, he may have intended only a prophetic sign, not a comprehensive cleansing. A brief symbolic action may have sufficed to express his intent, as even E. Sanders 1985: 70 acknowledges. Witherington 1990: 109–10 notes six historical questions that influence this passage and argue for its plausibility. One of the most basic is, Why invent such an event? Nolland 1993b: 935–36 notes nine views on this issue and opts for a modest, symbolic action against long-standing temple practice (pace Eppstein 1964) that thwarted true worship and called for purification, if not temple replacement.

9 “Leaders of the people” resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke’s account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

3 Nolland 1993b: 957 notes that all the nonbiblical parallels are secondary.

4 Nolland 1993b: 957 notes one exception: Petzke 1975.

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

2 For excellent overviews of the variety of positions on Lucan redaction, see Soards 1987: 13–16 and V. Taylor 1972: 3–27. Nolland 1993b: 1023 is convinced that Luke had a second source, which he thinks may be a continuous account.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the “two spirits” of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

18 The debate over the original wording of the tradition is complex and ultimately irresolvable, since it rests on so much speculation about what is likely. Marshall 1978: 804 and Schürmann 1955: 30–34, 123–28 argue for originality, Patsch 1972: 142–50 against it. Nolland 1993b: 1047 sees it as a later but quite accurate gloss, since Jesus looks to affirm his ongoing relationship to them despite his coming suffering.

20 On the various views, see the summary in Marshall 1978: 805–6, who argues that in general Luke's form is the most primitive, but notes the difficulty of the decision. Fitzmyer 1985: 1402 prefers Mark's originality, as does Nolland 1993b: 1047, who mostly follows Ruckstuhl 1980.

1 There is some contact between Luke's version of the final discourse and John's (John 13–16), but the two accounts complement each other more than they overlap. For discussion of these subunits and the source debate surrounding them, see Nolland 1993b: 1058–59, 1062–64, 1070–72, 1075. The basic debate turns on whether Luke is responsible for the differences from Mark and Matthew or whether they reflect his sources. The connection of Luke 22:21–23 to John 13:21–22, Luke 22:24–30 to John 13:1–20, and Luke 22:31–34 to John 13:37–38 suggests a traditional background to several Lucan differences.

20 Marshall 1978: 821 argues that ἐκλείπω (elsewhere in the NT at Luke 16:9; 23:45; Heb. 1:12) here means "to disappear," so the idea is that Peter's faith does not disappear. He avoids ultimate failure (cf. Col. 1:21– 23). Nolland's paraphrase (1993b: 1072) of faith "drained away to nothing" gives the sense.

25 Plummer 1896: 505 and Luce 1933: 335 make this connection, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1426 says that there is no need to do so. Nolland 1993b: 1073 suggests 2:30 a.m. for the initial crowing and notes that the reference in m. B. Qam. 7.7 forbidding chickens in Jerusalem is probably a later idealization and thus not a historical challenge to this detail.

2 Most who take this latter approach speak of dependence on Mark, while Matthean prioritists favor dependence on Matthew. Fitzmyer 1985: 1437–39 vigorously defends Lucan reworking of Mark, citing numerous touches of Lucan vocabulary. See the exegesis for details. For defense of an additional source, see Nolland 1993b: 1081–82. Connections with John 16:6, 20–22; 18:2, 11 suggest traditional background.

10 On standing in prayer, see 1 Sam. 1:26; Matt. 6:5; Mark 11:25; Luke 18:11. On kneeling in prayer, see Mark 15:19 (the soldiers' mock homage to Jesus); Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5; Eph. 3:14 (Nolland 1993b: 1083 suggests that people kneel for prayer in Acts when prayer is particularly intense). On separating from others for prayer or to go into God's presence, see Gen. 22:5; Exod. 19:7; 24:2, 14; and Lev. 16:17.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent

about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

1 On this custom, both generally and during Passover, see Nolland 1993b: 1129–30; the exegesis of 23:25; and excursus 11, objection 6.

3 Examples of Lucan style and vocabulary in the verse include πρός with a verb of speaking, καὶ ἰδού, ἐνώπιον, and probably the forensic use of ἀνακρίνω; R. Brown 1994: 791 and Nolland 1993b: 1127.

12 Marshall 1978: 867 suggests that Luke's lack of this detail argues for the presence of another source. On the details of the practice of crucifixion, see the exegesis of 23:21. A Jewish victim of crucifixion was recently found at Giv‹at ha-Mivtar (Nolland 1993b: 1145; bibliography on pp. 1140–41).

13 The name Calvary comes from calvaria, the Latin translation of κρανίον; Plummer 1896: 531; Geldenhuys 1951: 613. R. Brown 1994: 938–40 discusses the location of Golgotha and decides for the traditional location associated now with the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in what is called the Christian quarter of Jerusalem. Nolland 1993b: 1145 expresses less certainty about the locale.

19 Such notations by the state are common: Josephus, Antiquities 15.8.1 §272 (inscriptions that commemorate Caesar and present trophies of war); Suetonius, Caligula 32.2; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.1.44. In these other texts, the inscription is borne by the criminal or by someone in front of the cross (Nolland 1993b: 1148). Pilate's inscription stands behind the initials INRI seen in many famous paintings of this scene. INRI is an acronym for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), wording that parallels John's Gospel.

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

6 On general burial customs and for a good bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1165.

1 Nolland 1993b: 1177–78 assesses Meynet's 1978 proposal that a substantial portion of the chapter (i.e., 24:4–47) is chiastically structured around two themes: (1) Jesus is alive and (2) resurrection is announced by Jesus and the Scriptures. Nolland also has a full survey of the tradition-historical discussion and the history of the religious analogies (pp. 1177–88).

3 The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 397–98) illustrates a more detached approach, arguing that "words ascribed to Jesus after his death are not subject to historical verification" and that claims that Jesus spoke after his death are "beyond the limits of historical assessment." The variation in location and wording thus lead the seminar to print Jesus' reported promise (24:7) in black type. This total skepticism seems to emerge from the seminar's definitional stance and an unwillingness to allow for any degree of summary reporting in the Gospel accounts. For a good attempt to explain both the Galilean and the Jerusalem appearances, see Nolland 1993b: 1181.

8 Dillon 1978: 122–28 correctly speaks of a miracle-passion pattern that shows Jesus is rejected like the prophets of old (Luke 11:47–51; 13:34–35; Acts 7:51–53). The travelers do not yet understand the significance of these connections (Osborne 1984: 121 n. 24). This detail also shows clearly how Jesus' death is seen as a part of a Jewish squabble. The account takes a decidedly Jewish perspective on the events (e.g., the silence about Pilate's and Rome's roles; Nolland 1993b: 1202).

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

2 Traces of Lucan expression are (1) the genitive absolute in 24:36, (2) the double participle phrase πτοηθέντες … καὶ ἔμφοβοι γενόμενοι (became terrified … and startled) in 24:37 (cf. 21:9; 24:5), (3) the verb ἐπιδίδωμι (to offer) in 24:42 (five times in Luke; twice in Matthew; none in Mark), and (4) the phrase ἐνώπιον αὐτῶν (in front of them) in 24:43 (in the Synoptics only here; 5:25; and 24:11). Nolland 1993b: 1210–11 notes that many apparently Lucan points also show up in John (perhaps pointing to a shared common source), but John's use does not seem to be driven by Luke's unique development of the passage (against Neirynck 1985). Nolland sees 24:41b–43 as Lucan expansion, but possibly based in tradition. His attempt to argue that "fish" in 24:42–43 corresponds to "bread" in 24:30 to make the larger unit is parallel to 9:13, 16 seems subtle and forced. If Luke created the detail, it is more likely that he would have combined bread and fish in a single scene.

4 Lucan creation is also the view of the Jesus Seminar, which prints 24:44, 46–49 in black type (Funk and Hoover 1993: 400). In the seminar's view, these verses represent a third commission (Matt. 28:18–20; John 20:22–23). Nolland 1993b: 1225–26 also sees a Lucan development here, though (unlike the Jesus Seminar) he argues that it is a natural development of the tradition that Jesus appeared for a limited time. Nolland says that connection to tradition is possible, but not demonstrable. I prefer to see roots in a tradition and a real event, since Luke does not discuss new scenes elsewhere in his Gospel without the prompting of tradition.

6 BDR §423.2.7 and §423.1.2 notes that Luke uses the temporal genitive absolute fifty-seven times, while Acts has it one hundred times. The construction occurs in Matthew fifty-one times and in Mark thirty-four times. This is too common to attribute its presence to any one evangelist or to rule out its presence in the tradition (against Fitzmyer 1985: 1574 and Nolland 1993b: 1212).

2 Jeremias 1966: 15–84 deals with various aspects of this issue. Other key studies include Hoehner 1977: 74–90; Marshall 1980: 30–75 (which has the advantage of assessing Jeremias's claims); Jaubert 1965; Blinzler 1958; and R. Brown 1962b. For bibliography, see Nolland 1993b: 1035–40.

51 Fitzmyer 1985: 865–68, though going a different way, recognizes that it is unlikely that the text was a unit in a source shared with Matthew because, had Luke possessed Matthew's version, he would have used it. Fitzmyer is against the position of E. Norden, who argues that the original form is in Q and is reflected in Matthew. Norden cites not only Sir. 51 but also the Hermetic text Poimandres 32. Fitzmyer notes problems of artificial addition in Norden's citation of the Hermetic text.

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

8 Oepke, TDNT 4:22–24. Kittel, TDNT 1:84 n. 67, argues that the white-robed angels in Luke 24:4 and Acts 1:10 serve to indicate angelic glory. Their radiance finds its source in heaven.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

29 On νόσος, see Oepke, TDNT 4:1091; Matt. 4:23–24; 8:17; 9:35; 10:1; Mark 1:34; Luke 6:18; 7:21; 9:1.

12 Black 1967: 216–17. This view goes back to J. Wellhausen's 1903 commentary on Mark. Oepke, TDNT 5:311 n. 6, mentions this view but prefers to see a contradiction here. Oepke notes that Wellhausen rejected this solution in the 1911 edition of his Mark commentary.

13 Even Oepke, TDNT 5:312, esp. n. 7, who sees a problem in the verses, notes that long journeys in Palestine without footwear would be impossible.

13 The inhabitants of Jerusalem are often called τέκνα (children): Joel 2:23; Zech. 9:13; Bar. 4:19, 21, 25; 1 Macc. 1:38; Matt. 23:37; Luke 19:44; Oepke, TDNT 5:639.

15 On the regal image of the shepherd, see Jer. 31:10–14; Ezek. 34:11–16; Mic. 5:2–5 [5:1–4 MT]; John 10:11–12. On people as sheep, see Ps. 23; 119:176; Oepke, TDNT 1:395.

39 O'Neill 1959; Luke 4:24; 12:37; 18:17, 29; 21:32; 23:43. On the authenticity of these statements, see Marshall 1978: 187–88. Ἀμήν, transliterated from אָמֵן (ʾāmēn), means "let it be so."

4 On the history of this discussion, including the church fathers and the various views, see Orchard and Riley 1987. Goulder's detailed 1989 work is unique, arguing that the order is Mark–Matthew–Luke, but that Luke used only Mark and Matthew, not Q. One of the goals of his study is to challenge the existence of Q.

7 Guthrie 1970 deals with these issues from a conservative, evangelical viewpoint, while the introduction of Kümmel 1975 serves as a good survey of common critical approaches to these issues. See the introduction on “Sources” for these issues as they relate to Luke. Orchard and Riley 1987 detail the ancient testimony of the church on this question.

3 For effective refutation, see O’Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O’Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the “lostness” of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

12 Dillon 1978: 38–40 argues that Son of Man is a title of concealment of the passion secret (i.e., the Son of Man is hidden in his present activity as he executes God’s plan), but this is unlikely given the term’s public reuse by Stephen in Acts 7:56. Osborne 1984: 110 n. 13 correctly critiques this view.

20 Luke uses κύριος as a title for Jesus fifteen times in the narrative comments of his Gospel, almost always in non-Marcan settings (7:13, 19; 10:1, 39, 41; 11:39; 12:42a; 13:15; 17:5, 6; 18:6; 19:8a; 22:61 [twice]; 24:3); Osborne 1984: 104, esp. n. 5.

8 Dillon 1978: 122–28 correctly speaks of a miracle-passion pattern that shows Jesus is rejected like the prophets of old (Luke 11:47–51; 13:34–35; Acts 7:51–53). The travelers do not yet understand the significance of these connections (Osborne 1984: 121 n. 24). This detail also shows clearly how Jesus’ death is seen as a part of a Jewish squabble. The account takes a decidedly Jewish perspective on the events (e.g., the silence about Pilate's and Rome's roles; Nolland 1993b: 1202).

18 Meals are frequent in Luke: simple meals (7:36; 11:37; 14:1), feasts (5:29), miraculous provisions (9:16), cultic meals (22:14), wedding feasts (14:8–9), and the eschatological banquet (12:37; 13:29); Osborne 1984: 123 n. 26; Plummer 1896: 556. That Jesus ate such meals with the "wrong people" is noted in 15:1 and 19:1.

23 Parsons 1987: 193–94, 196 posits that Bethany is named in order to provide literary closure to the triumphal entry by being a triumphal departure. But this link could occur with either Bethany or the Mount of Olives. It is not clear that Acts 1:2 and 1:6–11 are distinct events (Parsons gives strong arguments for one event, though the chronology is a tension for this option). Nonetheless, the popular idea of Lucan literary telescoping is possible given the lack of explicit temporal markers in Luke 24:44, 50 and Luke's love of retelling major events (e.g., Saul's conversion and the offer of the gospel to Cornelius; C. A. Evans 1990: 360–62). Seeing the ascension as an event that is telescoped here allows one to see how the different Galilean appearances suggested by Matthew and John fit into the timing of events more easily. See also Osborne 1984: 137–38, 266–70.

27 Joy (χαρά) is a Lucan theme: Luke 1:14; 2:10; 8:13; 10:17; 15:7, 10; 24:41; Acts 8:8; 12:14; 13:52; 15:3. Osborne 1984: 140 notes that in Luke's writings joy is a present experience shared to the degree of one's participation in events.

1 The best cases for this structure are made by Moessner 1983 and O'Toole 1987b. Moessner notes four basic approaches to the unit before making a case that much of the passage previews a “prophet like Moses” motif in the journey section of Luke. O’Toole correctly critiques Moessner as emphasizing the prophet too much at the expense of messianic categories, though for Luke the two concepts are very close, as Acts 3:13–26 shows.

12 Note the use in Acts 2 of Joel 2, Ps. 16, and Ps. 110, along with the allusion to 2 Sam. 7, the Davidic covenant, through the appeal to Ps. 132:11 in Acts 2:30–31. There is parallel teaching in Luke 24:44–47 and Acts 13:16–39, as well as in Paul’s defense speeches (e.g., Acts 26:16–23). Acts 13 also appeals to realized Davidic promises; see Bock 1992c; Bock 1994a; O’Toole 1987a: 153–58.

23 Parsons 1987: 193–94, 196 posits that Bethany is named in order to provide literary closure to the triumphal entry by being a triumphal departure. But this link could occur with either Bethany or the Mount of Olives. It is not clear that Acts 1:2 and 1:6–11 are distinct events (Parsons gives strong arguments for one event, though the chronology is a tension for this option). Nonetheless, the popular idea of Lucan literary telescoping is possible given the lack of explicit temporal markers in Luke 24:44, 50 and Luke’s love of retelling major events (e.g., Saul’s conversion and the offer of the gospel to Cornelius; C. A. Evans 1990: 360–62). Seeing the ascension as an event that is telescoped here allows one to see how the different Galilean appearances suggested by Matthew and John fit into the timing of events more easily. See also Osborne 1984: 137–38, 266–70.

28 Parsons 1987: 29–52 has a long, thoughtful discussion of the Western noninterpolations and accepts them all on the premise that P^{75} has a doctrinal reason for including them. He sees codex D as adding to the Christology of the chapter, especially the physical reality of the resurrection. But he fails to see that the omission of καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν (and he was carried up into heaven) in 24:51 means that the ascension is no longer explicit in Luke (though it is alluded to in Acts 1:2). Parsons also assumes that P^{75} or a text like it is responsible for these additions, but this conclusion seems to put too much weight on P^{75}—reversing the way this manuscript is generally treated. The widespread lack of witnesses for the Western noninterpolations in Luke 24, however, stands against their originality. It is the presence of א* that makes this example so debatable.

18 The debate over the original wording of the tradition is complex and ultimately irresolvable, since it rests on so much speculation about what is likely. Marshall 1978: 804 and Schürmann 1955: 30–34, 123–28 argue for originality, Patsch 1972: 142–50 against it. Nolland 1993b: 1047 sees it as a later but quite accurate gloss, since Jesus looks to affirm his ongoing relationship to them despite his coming suffering.

9 On the relationship of Luke to Mark, see Marshall 1978: 318. The differences in wording show interpretive paraphrasing by the evangelists in this material, but it is in line with Jesus' original teaching and authentically reflects his teaching. For major arguments defending the authenticity, see P. Payne 1980.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

17 Any charge today that dispensationalism sees two ways of salvation or sees too great a law/grace contrast in the sermon grossly misrepresents where many of its adherents are now. Such a monolithic view of dispensationalism fails to see the variations that have long been a part of this approach. Gerstner 1991 irresponsibly engages in such confusion and minimizes the significance of such differences, which dispensationalists like C. C. Ryrie and J. D. Pentecost have long noted. Gerstner's charge of antinomianism is a distortion that warps his ability to appreciate the distinctions in the movement. The charge also underestimates the significance of the current discussion about the function of the law within covenant theology, as well as its debate with theonomy; see D. Turner 1991; J. Martin 1986; and J. Martin 1992.

7 Fitzmyer notes that there is no evidence for this third view, which goes back to Perles 1919–20; see also Black 1967: 207–8. SB 1:489 rejects the suggestion.

27 Gressmann 1911 notes the nature of the customs. Perles's attempt (1919–20) to suggest an Aramaic element תבל (tbl) behind the tradition that should be translated "seasoning" instead of "soil" fails on lexical grounds. The תבל/γῆ interchange is found in Isa. 14:21; 26:9, 18; 1 Chron. 16:30; cf. 11QtgJob 24.8; 29.3 with Job 34:13; 37:12. Correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1069–70 and Black 1967: 166–67.

29 Perrin 1963: 64–66; Acts 21:33; Luke 12:33; 22:47; 24:15, 28. Luke 15:1 and 18:40 show that Luke often uses ἐγγίζω to mean "arrive." Fitzmyer 1985: 848–49 argues that when the verb is tied to a time reference it speaks of the approach of an event in the near future.

16 On Matthew, see Hill 1972: 200–201. Perrin 1963: 172–74 does not discuss Luke 16:16b because, in his view, it is a later addition to the tradition, a view that grows out of his identifying the two texts as the same tradition. Marshall 1978: 630 argues almost single-handedly for a positive sense in Matthew: “Men of violence seize at the opportunity of entering the kingdom.” This is not likely.

40 For refutation of France’s attempt (1971: 227–39) to tie this remark to a.d. 70, see Marshall 1978: 776–77, who notes that the presence of cosmic signs, the force of Dan. 7:13, and the context all argue against such a view. Marshall also defends the saying’s authenticity and rightly questions attempts to reject the saying because of the Synoptic mixture of OT text (Ps. 110 and Dan. 7) or by holding that other sayings such as Mark 8:38 or 14:62 are earlier. Colpe, TDNT 8:450, and Perrin 1967: 173–85 deny authenticity; Hooker 1967: 148–59 and Borsch 1967: 361–64 defend it.

8 Carson 1984: 223–24, in critique of Pesch’s view. Fitzmyer 1981: 590 is uncommitted, though he appears to lean toward equating the two names, calling two names “theoretically possible,” while noting the debate of the early church. For examples of double names, see Acts 1:23; 12:25; 13:9; double Semitic names include Joseph Barnabas (Acts 4:36) and Joseph Caiaphas (Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §35).

7 Bultmann 1963: 210 classifies it as a miracle of healing. Bovon 1989: 432 and Theissen 1983: 321 call it an exorcism. Theissen also speaks of the liberation of an enslaved personality (pp. 89–90). Berger 1984: 311 puts it in his “epideixis/demonstratio” category (where he puts many miracles). He also speaks of the account as a “mandatio” that highlights Jesus’ authority and power. Pesch 1971: 354 notes the form elements in Mark: encounter (5:1–2), demon's defensive reaction (5:6–7), exorcist's command (5:8), exit of demon (5:13), crowd amazement and spread of exorcist's fame (5:14a, 18–20).

8 The addition of the missionary emphasis at the end is called secondary on the assumption that multiple forms are not in the original tradition. But most now see that the tradition did reach Mark already in this form. This is an example against the supposed rule, which raises questions about the rule! But for development, see Kertelge 1970: 107. Another key study of this event also seeing stages in the development of the account is Pesch 1972; an earlier English version is Pesch 1971. However, Nolland 1989: 404 rightly sees the double purpose tied to the influence of eyewitness memory, an observation that applies to many fixed-form accounts. The appeal to major stages of development is not necessary.

7 Also, the Jewish prayer Kaddish is often cited as relevant, but it is uncertain that its roots go back this far (for discussion, see Petuchowski and Brocke 1978).

4 Nolland 1993b: 957 notes one exception: Petzke 1975.

8 Pickl argues for this distinction by comparing Josephus, Antiquities 3.10.5 §249 and 2.15.1 §317. Jeremias argues that the second text addresses Diaspora practice about all festivals and as such does not apply.

28 For a balanced treatment of this passage as it relates to current sociopolitical issues, see Pilgrim 1981: 64–84.

34 On this topic in the Synoptics, see T. Schmidt 1987. In arguing against making too much of the criticism, Schmidt is correct, but his book perhaps overreacts in the other direction. More balanced is Pilgrim 1981.

9 Pilgrim 1981: 94 says that it is selling all “in the service of the kingdom and the discipleship of Jesus” and that the remark is for all disciples.

3 So, e.g., Jeremias 1963a: 45–48. Marshall 1978: 622–23 notes that even if, as he believes, this is a compilation, the teaching still comes from traditional material. Since he defends the authenticity of 16:13, this seems to imply the authenticity of the whole of 16:9–13. Pilgrim 1981: 127, however, alludes to the work of a Christian preacher or teacher. Talbert 1982: 153 is probably incorrect to call 16:8b an initial interpretation of the parable, since it is really an observation that produces an application only by implication. The phrase but I say to you in 16:9 is the start of the parable’s formal application and is not a Lucan expression (Jeremias 1980: 106).

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan 1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

24 See Plummer 1896: 4 for a defense of παρακολουθέω with this meaning; BAGD 619 §3 cites other ancient texts; also BAA 64. Among them are the already noted texts by Josephus: Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218. See Du Plessis 1974: 267.

13 Lev. 21:7, 14 discusses the laws regarding priestly marriages and restricts the priests to virgins (Marshall 1978: 52). SB 2:68–71 notes that this type of priestly union was encouraged; Plummer 1896: 9. For ancient Jewish rules of marriage, including reference to some Jewish texts after the first century, see G. Moore 1927–30: 2.119–22 and Safrai 1976a: 752–60.

16 Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:26; Num. 36:13; Deut. 4:40; 10:13; 27:10; 2 Kings 17:13. In Judaism: 1 Macc. 2:21; T. Levi 14.4; T. Judah 13.1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:220; Klostermann 1929: 6; Plummer 1896: 9 (who notes that the terms are synonymous in this usage).

18 Lev. 20:20–21; Jer. 22:30; 1 Sam. 1:5–6; 2 Sam. 6:23; Plummer 1896: 10; Fitzmyer 1981: 323; J. Schneider, TDNT 5:239. Contrast Gen. 1:28; Ps. 127, 128.

34 Plummer 1896: 12; Marshall 1978: 55. The reaction to Orson Welles's broadcast of the "War of the Worlds" is a good illustration of this phenomenon.

35 In Luke's writings: Luke 1:30; 2:10; Acts 18:9; 27:24; elsewhere in the NT: Matt. 1:20; 28:5, 10; Mark 6:50; Rev. 1:17; in the OT: Gen. 15:1; 26:24; Josh. 8:1; Isa. 43:1, 5; 44:2; Jer. 46:27–28; Dan. 10:12. See Balz, TDNT 9:212 §D2c; Marshall 1978: 56; Plummer 1896: 12; Creed 1930: 10.

54 Plummer 1896: 18; the plural English verb is a result of the collective noun λαός, which though singular in form is plural in sense. Luke loves to use a vivid, progressive imperfect.

55 Ἐν τῷ χρονίζειν is probably a temporal infinitive and translates as “as he delayed” or “while he delayed,” though a causal idea is possible, which would mean they wondered “because of” his delay. Plummer 1896: 18 argues for a temporal infinitive.

60 For this meaning, see Luke 5:22; 7:37; 23:7; 24:16, 31, as well as six times in Acts (with a different force); Plummer 1896: 18; Marshall 1978: 61.

61 Luke 24:23; Acts 26:19; 2 Cor. 12:1; Dan. 9:23; 10:1, 7, 8, 16 [all Theodotion]; Plummer 1896: 18. The experience is called a vision because Zechariah saw an angel, a being that normally goes unseen; Michaelis, TDNT 5:372. Luke is not psychologizing here; it is an angelophany. See Luke 1:11.

65 Num. 8:22; 16:9; 18:4; 2 Chron. 31:2; also Heb. 8:6; 9:21; Plummer 1896: 18; Fitzmyer 1981: 329; Strathmann, TDNT 4:219–22, 227.

67 The term is used with a similar sense in 1:31, 36; 2:21; Plummer 1896: 19.

71 Ἀφελεῖν is the object of ἐπεῖδεν and functions as a purpose infinitive, while ἐν ἀνθρώποις is tied to ὄνειδος, as the positive note in 1:36 shows; Fitzmyer 1981: 329–30; Plummer 1896: 20. Acts 15:14 is a grammatically parallel verb-object-infinitive construction.

21 The use of the article as a pronoun is rare, but usually involves the singular “he” or “she”; Plummer 1896: 22; BDR §3.6.

31 Plummer 1896: 23. Godet’s argument is correct, since a Christianized version would not focus so exclusively on Israel. The remarks belong in the context in which Luke has them.

33 Zechariah asks “how shall I know this?” versus Mary’s “how can this be?” Zechariah asks for a sign; Godet 1875: 1.92; Plummer 1896: 24; Schürmann 1969: 49.

47 The relationship between Mary and Elizabeth is not specified. Wycliffe seems to be responsible for associating the two as cousins; Plummer 1896: 25; R. Brown 1977: 292. On the problem of a supposed contradiction between John and Jesus as relatives and the statements of John 1:31, 33, see the additional note on 1:25.

13 Plummer 1896: 30. Other beatitudes are 6:20–22; 7:23; 10:23; 11:27–28; 12:37–38, 43; 14:14–15; 23:29.

15 Plummer 1896: 29; Marshall 1978: 81. BDF §189.3 speaks of an ellipsis in the verse.

16 Plummer 1896: 29. Luke 10:11 and 12:39 are syntactically parallel but use ὅτι, not ἵνα; BDF §394; BDR §394.3.3. Ἵνα is epexegetical.

13 Charts detailing the various OT parallels in the hymn can be found in Plummer 1896: 30–31; Klostermann 1929: 18–19; and R. Brown 1977: 358–60. The fullest chart including Qumran parallels is Bemile 1986: 116–33. For the connection to 1 Sam. 2, see Goulder 1989: 225–29, who also notes parallels to Ps. 88 and 102.

15 Plummer 1896: 32. The remarks made here are always true of God’s character (1:50) and apply to anyone who shares in the promise of the covenant.

23 Danker 1988: 43–44; Ellis 1974: 76; Klostermann 1929: 20; Godet 1875: 1.104–5; Plummer 1896: 33; Marshall 1978: 84. It must be remembered that Luke presented the passage as Mary's words, so he must expect them to be read prophetically. Here is another failure of the view (1b) that argues for a reference to Jesus' work in the past.

25 SB 1:892; Schweizer 1984: 42; Plummer 1896: 41. One could argue that the figure means "for the sake of the fathers," but this rendering seems too soft in light of the belief that the righteous experience resurrection (16:19–31).

29 Danker 1988: 48–49; Plummer 1896: 42; Hauck, TDNT 5:491 n. 24, 493. The combination is found elsewhere in Wis. 9:3 and Eph. 4:24. God seeks righteousness and worship even among the heathen: Acts 13:10, 16; 24:25; 10:35, 43; Schrenk, TDNT 2:199. In the OT, Josh. 24:14 is similar in thrust; Nolland 1989: 88.

35 Plummer 1896: 42. The NT refers to this concept in alternative ways: Mark 1:4; Matt. 26:28; Luke 1:77; 24:47; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 10:43; 13:38; 26:18; Col. 1:14; Heb. 10:11 ("take away sin"); Eph. 2:17 ("peace"); Bultmann, TDNT 1:511.

36 Plummer does not cite anyone who argues for this option. "Knowledge of salvation" in Hebrew idiom refers to the experience of salvation; Ps. 98:2; Nolland 1989: 89.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

2 Major discussions can be found in Fitzmyer 1981: 392–93; R. Brown 1977: 411; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Creed 1930: 30–32; Schürmann

1969: 103–4, 108–9, 118–19; Marshall 1978: 96–97; Plummer 1896: 46; Nolland 1989: 98–103; and Ernst 1977: 99.

7 Plummer 1896: 46. Mary is not the only possible option, since sources could include the family or the shepherds, making this view more like view 3.

15 Only one LXX context refers to Bethlehem as David's city: 1 Sam. 20:6 ("his city"). David's connection with Bethlehem is noted in the MT of 1 Sam. 17:12, 58, but these verses are absent from the LXX; 1 Sam. 16:18 LXX connects the city with Jesse, not David. Even Judaism did not have a Bethlehem-Davidic-Messianic connection; SB 1:82–83; Plummer 1896: 52; Bock 1987: 75.

18 Plummer 1896: 53. Bovon 1989: 120 n. 36 notes that expansions on the birth miracle occur in the second-century Protevangelium of James 4–10, 19–20.

24 Fitzmyer 1981: 406; ANET 489. Schürmann 1969: 102 n. 30 notes that Plummer's option is a popular etymology.

25 Hendriksen 1978: 141; Godet 1875: 1.129; Plummer 1896: 52. Schrenk, TDNT 5:1016–17, esp. n. 7, argues similarly. The term οἶκος refers to the whole house of a ruler, while πατριά is added, so that the reference to the whole house is clearly seen as a specific reference to ancestry.

16 Plummer 1896: 57. Traub, TDNT 5:537–38, discusses the "heavenly host." A singular noun joined to a plural participle is an ad sensum construction; BDR §134.1b.

26 Plummer 1896: 60 gives all the combinations: human to human (1 Sam. 15:30); human to God (Exod. 15:2); God to human (Ps. 91:15 [90:15 LXX]).

32 The KJV reflects a three-part division by reading nominative εὐδοκία; so Godet 1875: 1.132–33. Many recent translations reflect a two-part division by reading genitive εὐδοκίας; so Plummer 1896: 57–58; Fitzmyer 1981: 410–12; and R. Brown 1977: 403–5.

11 Most commentators note that Mary's association with purification argues against a view that sees her as an "intact virgin" after Jesus' birth; see 1:34; Creed 1930: 39; Plummer 1896: 63; R. Brown 1977: 436; Fitzmyer 1981: 421.

12 Godet 1875: 1.137; Plummer 1896: 65; Fitzmyer 1981: 426. In favor of this view is Cutler 1966. New Testament uses of the name include Luke 3:30; Acts 13:1; 15:14; 2 Pet. 1:1; Rev. 7:7. Simon is a variation of the name.

15 Bultmann, TDNT 2:753; Plato, Statesman 311B; Luce 1933: 101; Plummer 1896: 66, who notes that Philo used the term to describe Abraham in Who Is the Heir? 6 §22.

25 On the grammar of κατὰ πρόσωπον, see BAGD 406 §II.1b; BAA 825 §II.1b; BDF §140; Plummer 1896: 69.

26 See Plummer 1896: 69 for four grammatical options for the genitive; Farris 1985: 149. R. Brown 1977: 440 notes that the peculiarity of the syntax here is a reflection of Semitic style; BDF §259.3.

9 Danker 1988: 74; Plummer 1896: 74. BDF §305 discusses the distributive use of κατά that is present here.

10 Josephus, Antiquities 17.9.3 §213; Jeremias, TDNT 5:898 §1. The reference in the verse to the Passover, τῇ ἑορτῇ τοῦ πάσχα, is grammatically to be taken as a dative of time: “at the time of the feast of the Passover” (Plummer 1896: 74; Luke uses a dative of time at 8:29 and 12:20).

11 Ellis 1974: 85–86. Plummer 1896: 75 cites a source describing contemporary, not ancient, Bedouin.

14 Plummer 1896: 75 cites H. B. Tristram. Wight 1953: 121 also mentions a split travel custom of children spending time with kin and neighbors, but without citing ancient evidence.

5 Plummer 1896: 94 n. 1 notes that the use of the redundant αὐτοῦ is a Semitism. In translation the repetition is omitted, because it sounds awkward.

1 Plummer 1896: 106; Manson 1949: 46 (who strongly defends this view); Dupont 1968: 97–115 (who argues for a middle course between literalism and parable); Carson 1984: 111; Nolland 1989: 177 (who defends the plausibility of Jesus’ reporting this event to his disciples). On the other end of the spectrum apparently is Crossan (1991), who does not even discuss this event in his portrayal of Jesus. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 133–34 [Matt.], 278–80 [Luke]) places all the sayings of this unit in black type, thereby indicating rejection of a tie to Jesus. The consensus of the seminar is that the text is legendary, like Greco-Roman biography, and that the sayings were authored by Q following the LXX. The seminar calls it an “ordeal story,” but this generic form category does not explain the explicit uniqueness of this confrontation account, a point that negates this argument. Manson 1949: 45–46 rightly challenges the description of the account as legendary (see the discussion of form below). LXX citations reflect only Luke’s sensitivity to his Greek audience and are not evidence of the text's origin, since MT renderings would work (Nolland 1989: 177).

17 Note that ἐμοί is also in the emphatic position; Plummer 1896: 111. Matt. 4:8 speaks of the kingdoms and their glory, while Luke stresses what they have: "authority."

22 Bovon 1989: 200 n. 36. Προσκυνέω is also found in Acts 7:43; 8:27; 10:25; 24:11. It always has a religious force for Luke. Ἐνώπιον with a genitive is common in Luke (twenty-two times, including 1:15, 17, 19, 75, 76; 5:18, 25; Plummer 1896: 112).

25 Plummer 1896: 113 raises the suggestion, but is not sure of it, while Glickman 1983: 234 is for it.

40 Plummer 1896: 128 notes two grammatical-stylistic points: ἐπί plus the accusative refers to duration of time: "the heavens were closed for three-and-a-half years" (Acts 13:31 and 19:10 are stylistically parallel); and λιμός is masculine, which reflects common usage over the use of the feminine. These points do not influence the passage's meaning.

19 Ellis 1974: 100; Plummer 1896: 134. Compare Tob. 8:1–3; Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49 (where the reference is to the powers that Solomon—a regal figure—possessed over evil forces); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 85. Nolland 1989: 210 notes eight different methods that Jesus used in his various healings in Luke, all of which involve his word or personal touch.

27 Παραχρῆμα occurs sixteen times in Luke–Acts and elsewhere in the NT only twice at Matt. 21:19–20; Plummer 1896: 157; Creed 1930: 71.

Ἐφίστημι appears eighteen times in Luke–Acts and not at all in Mark or Matthew; Schramm 1971: 88.

30 Plummer 1896: 138; Schneider 1977a: 116; Fitzmyer 1981: 553. Against this argument is Farmer 1964: 128–30, who sees Mark combining both Matthew and Luke; but see Fitzmyer 1972.

2 Plummer 1896: 147 lists seven points of dissimilarity between these accounts. My parenthetical comments in Brown's list above show some of the questions raised about this connection. Note also the similarities listed by Bovon 1989: 228–29: Jesus face to face with Peter, Peter's prominence, Jesus' instruction, the new attempt to catch fish, the obedience of the fishermen, the miraculous catch, the reaction of Peter, and the promise. He sees an original promise to Peter, which the church expanded in two directions: Luke in terms of discipleship and John in terms of call.

17 BAGD 443 §2; BAA 901 §2; Luke 12:27; Acts 20:35; John 4:6; Matt. 6:28; Josh. 24:13; Plummer 1896: 143.

9 Nor should the name Ἰακώβου([son] of James) be read as the brother of James; but so T. Beza, an approach rightly rejected by Plummer 1896: 175.

10 Simon-Peter, Thomas-Didymus, Matthew-Levi, Bartholomew-Nathanael (apparently, see the exegesis of 6:14); Plummer 1896: 172, 174; Schürmann 1969: 317–18 n. 49; Jeremias 1971a: 232–33. These variations suggest that the tradition of the list of the Twelve existed in various forms.

58 For κατανοέω, see Luke 12:24, 27; 20:23; Acts 11:6; Plummer 1896: 191. Nolland 1989: 307 argues that the force is that one should attend to nonjudgment and love of the enemy, not ethical minutiae. This is correct contextually, but the remark is so proverbial that the application is broader. Sin in general is in view.

70 Ἰσχύω with the infinitive occurs in 8:43; 13:24; 14:6, 29, 30; 16:3; 20:26; and four times in Acts; Plummer 1896: 193; BAGD 383 §2b; BAA 778 §2b.

7 BAGD 189; BAA 379–80; Foerster, TDNT 7:990 §D.II.1a. Of eight NT uses of διασώζω, six are in Luke–Acts: Matt. 14:36; 1 Pet. 3:20; Luke 7:3; Acts 23:24; 27:43, 44; 28:1, 4; Plummer 1896: 195.

8 Matt. 9:36; 14:14; 15:32; 18:27; 20:34; Mark 1:41; 6:34; 8:2; Plummer 1896: 199; Bovon 1989: 362 nn. 43–44. The other Lucan uses of σπλαγχνίζομαι, Luke 10:33 and 15:20, are both in parables.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

39 Luke 3:18 and 6:6 seem to ignore any clean distinction. In favor of the distinction are Godet 1875: 1.345 and Plummer 1896: 202; against it are Elliott 1969 and BDF §306.

6 Plummer 1896: 210 suggests that she is a prostitute, citing Matt. 21:32 as support. Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327, says that this interpretation of the terminology fits rabbinic expression, but gives no specifics at this point; Rengstorf's article shows ἁμαρτωλός to refer to a wide variety of the ungodly, including the Sadducees (m. Ketub. 7.6).

17 Plummer cites Socrates' phrase as πάνυ ὀρθῶς; so also Godet 1875: 1.359 and Bovon 1989: 393 n. 53. However, no reference is given in any of these sources. A check of Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, an electronic database containing most of the extant ancient Greek literature, did not surface the phrase in Socrates. This classical comparison should not be made until the texts are revealed. However, the general rhetorical pattern does fit a type of Socratic interrogation; see Daube 1956: 152; Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.18.2.

18 Plummer 1896: 212 notes that the question whether he sees her (βλέπεις) is also a call to consider her actions.

16 Plummer 1896: 219 notes that figures as large as three-hundredfold are given for grain in Babylon; Herodotus 1.193.

36 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 9:29–33; Plummer 1896: 220. The imagery of 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 8:41–44 is close to this parable; Fitzmyer 1981: 712; Schürmann 1969: 463 n. 131. 1 Enoch 62.8 speaks of sowing saints.

39 So Ernst 1977: 269. Some see a Paulinist touch here. Plummer 1896: 220 suggests that the Lucan conclusion in 8:12 may go back to Paul; Arndt 1956: 230. Others suggest that Luke is using church terminology to make clear what Jesus means, a point that seems likely; Marshall 1978: 325; Fitzmyer 1981: 713.

1 So Plummer 1896: 222 sees Luke gathering in one place Matthew's distinct texts.

2 Creed 1930: 120 and Luce 1933: 170–71 both call it a "strange story" and a "popular tale"; see also Bultmann 1963: 210–11. Plummer 1896: 228 lists nine explanations offered for the material.

11 On this title, see Luke 1:32, 35, 76. According to Josephus, Antiquities 16.6.2 §163, this was the Gentile way to refer to the God of the Jews; Luce 1933: 172. So also Plummer 1896: 229–30, citing Dan. 3:26; 4:24 [4:21 MT]; 5:18; 7:18; Bovon 1989: 429 n. 4.

32 So Cranfield 1959: 176. Plummer 1896: 227 speaks of Kersa, a locale near the lake, but he rejects Origen's association of it with Gergesa. Arndt 1956: 239–40 and Bovon 1989: 434 accept Gergesa as original in Luke. Liefeld 1984: 914–15 is rightly cautious about a solution, as is Nolland 1989: 407. No clearly superior option exists between reading a regional reference or concluding that Gergesa is intended.

2 Plummer 1896: 233 cites the Acts of Pilate (= Gospel of Nicodemus) 1.7 as the first text to name her Bernice (= Latin Veronica); Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.511. This apocryphal work is available in a fifth-century edition, though its roots may reach back to the second century.

33 Plummer 1896: 235; Marshall 1978: 344; Fitzmyer 1981: 746; Bovon 1989: 445–46 (who argues that Luke may be responsible for it); Creed 1930: 123; and Hendriksen 1978: 466 appear undecided. Arndt 1956: 246 and A. B. Bruce 1897: 525 are for inclusion. Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 137; Ellis 1974: 130; and Luce 1933: 173 omit it.

9 On ἡμέρα (day) with κλίνω (to decline), see BAGD 436 §2; BAA 887–88. Luke 24:29 speaks of the day "wearing down"; Plummer 1896: 243; cf. Jer. 6:4; Judg. 19:11.

4 Plummer 1896: 249–50 actually lists seven views, but the four below are the most prevalent. In fact, some of his options are variations of the same view (see view 2). Scholars cited without documentation are listed in Plummer.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

5 The identity of the child is not given or known. Plummer 1896: 258 mentions a tradition that the church father Ignatius was the child, but this tradition dates from the ninth century: Anastasius Bibliothecarius (PL 129:42); Nicephorus Callistus (PL 143:848); Lightfoot 1889–90: 2.1.27, 2.2.22. Chrysostom and Eusebius lack this tradition.

10 Fitzmyer 1981: 825 uses this division, but says it is one of "convenience, since the division at these points is otherwise insignificant and somewhat arbitrary." Plummer 1896: 261 also speaks of "convenience." Such markers do not really note a shift of themes, and so are less than adequate.

9 Plummer 1896: 264 notes that Luke makes nothing of this nickname. Marshall 1978: 406 rejects the suggestion of the nickname's connection with this incident, noting that the name is absent and that it is not likely that Jesus would give them a derogatory nickname. In addition, Mark 3:17 does not say that the name came from Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 536 notes that the concern of James and John in Mark 10:35–45 also revolves around power. But disciples are to serve. The nickname may allude to their character, which is undergoing reformation.

4 Plummer 1896: 266 argues correctly that efforts to identify this man as Philip or Thomas are speculative and cannot be confirmed, though the identification dates back to Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 3.4.522.

10 Plummer 1896: 271 notes that early church historians attempted to name some of the seventy-two. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 1.12, mentions Barnabas, Sosthenes, Matthias, Joseph Barsabbas, and Thaddaeus. But the tradition is problematic, since it also includes the Cephas of Gal. 2:11—as distinct from the apostle Peter! Even though some later fathers (beginning with Clement of Alexandria) argue that a different Cephas was in view in Galatians, the Cephas of Galatians must be Peter, since he is called a "pillar." It may be that the fathers wanted to spare Peter the criticism that he received from Paul, since they found it hard to believe that he erred so publicly.

45 Plummer 1896: 279 notes two later traditions about John's being preserved from boiling oil and his failing to succumb to hemlock, but the origin of these accounts is uncertain. Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 36, records the first incident.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

4 Plummer 1896: 293 argues that if the prayer was delivered only once, then Luke has the original setting, which came earlier in Jesus' ministry. I agree that this is the next best option, given the possibility that the Sermon on the Mount is an anthology or a preaching summary.

14 Jeremias 1971a: 63–68 notes no example of "my Father" in the literature. In fact, in Judaism such intimacy was avoided. Jeremias 1967b: 16–29 lists the potential Jewish parallels. Dunn 1975: 21–26 notes that Jeremias overstates the case in allowing no exceptions, but suggests that Jeremias's general portrait is correct. Plummer 1896: 296 remarks that God as the Father of Israel is an OT image; the concept of God as Father to individual people begins to appear only in intertestamental Judaism (see the texts in the previous note). Jesus' reference to "my Father" is highly unusual, though not unprecedented: 4Q372; 3 Macc. 6:3; Wis. 14:3; and Sir. 23:1 use "my Father" or "Father." In the NT, see Luke 2:49; 10:22 = Matt. 11:27; Luke 22:29; 24:49; Matt. 7:21; 10:32–33; 12:50; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10, 35; 20:23; 25:34; 26:29, 39, 53. The contrast is striking and significant.

22 Fitzmyer 1985: 906 notes similar usage at Qumran and suggests that Luke refers to sins to prevent confusion for his Greek audience. The use of ἁμαρτίας looks like the LXX, esp. Ps. 24:18 [25:18 Eng.]; also Gen. 50:17; Exod. 32:32; Num. 14:19; Plummer 1896: 297.

27 Plummer 1896: 298 notes the shift from the awkward future indicative to a deliberative subjunctive in reporting the call to the friend. See also n. 30.

30 Battle imagery with evil angels in the OT includes Isa. 24:22–23; in Judaism, T. Sim. 6.6 and T. Zeb. 9.8. Plummer 1896: 303; Danker 1988: 233; and Schürmann 1994: 243 see an allusion to Isa. 49:25–26. The battle imagery is similar, but the application to spiritual forces does not fit Isaiah's language in 49:26a, which clearly pictures humans. At best, Isaiah shows the principle involved. Such a move with imagery, however, is not surprising; see Luke 1:67–79 and Bock 1993. The point in the language for Luke is how Jesus, as God's representative, is God's victorious warrior.

36 Plummer 1896: 303 and Hendriksen 1978: 622 cite Matt. 9:36; Isa. 40:11; and John 10:16 in support of a figure about sheep. To these could be added Ezek. 34 (where God is the Great Shepherd) and Zech. 13:7–9 (with its image of scattered sheep).

5 Liefeld 1984: 952 and Plummer 1896: 304 argue that spiritual renewal is the issue, not exorcism. For Liefeld, exorcism would lead to Spirit indwelling. But demons formerly at home now looking for a home suggests exorcism, and there is no guarantee that exorcism automatically produces Spirit indwelling.

8 Plummer 1896: 306 argues that resurrection is implied at the end of the verse by the giving of a sign, but the Lucan context alone does not make such a reference clear. Hendriksen 1978: 627 and Arndt 1956: 302 make resurrection the only point, though Arndt admits that only Matthew makes this connection clear.

14 Ps. 14:1; 53:1 [53:2 MT]; 92:6 [92:7 MT]; 94:8; Prov. 6:12; Luke 12:20; Rom. 2:20; 1 Cor. 15:36; 2 Cor. 11:16, 19; 12:6, 11; SB 1:280; 2:102 (discusses Jewish warnings about having an arrogant heart, with Deut. 8:11–14 being the key text); Schweizer 1984: 199; Plummer 1896: 310; Bertram, TDNT 9:230–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 947. On the OT background, see Donald 1963.

25 Plummer 1896: 313 speaks of divine providence. Marshall 1978: 502–4 distinguishes between the view that sees God speaking in his wisdom and one that sees "divine wisdom" like that found in Prov. 8. But the views are very close, since Prov. 8 is a figurative reference.

8 On the coin, see BAGD 117; BAA 235; Matt. 10:29 (the only other NT use). Wiefel 1988: 233 puts its worth at five pfennigs, one of the smallest German coins. A denarius was a day's wage, so this is very little money. The most basic worker would earn this in roughly a half hour. The term for sparrow (στρουθίον) may also indicate simply a "little bird"; Plummer 1896: 319–20; Ps. 11:1 [10:1 LXX]; 84:3 [83:4 LXX]; MM 594; Bauernfeind, TDNT 7:730, 732 n. 19; Fitzmyer 1985: 960.

10 Only the verbal forms differ: Matthew has ἠριθμημέναι εἰσίν and Luke ἠρίθμηνται (both meaning “are numbered”). 1 Sam. 14:45; 2 Sam. 14:11; 1 Kings 1:52; and Dan. 3:27 use the idiom for the total protection indicated by not one hair being lost; Plummer 1896: 320; Fitzmyer 1985: 960; Luke 21:18; Acts 27:34. Luke’s idiom is a variation on the OT idiom and means “God knows exactly where you stand.”

8 This stands in contrast to Prov. 11:26; Jer. 17:11; 1 Enoch 97.8–10. Sir. 11:18–19 is especially close to Jesus’ picture, except that wealth comes through self-denial and diligence (lit., “from afflicting himself”), not simply fortune as in Luke. The LXX renders the key phrase “by his wariness and pinching,” referring to frugality; Schweizer 1984: 207. Note also Ps. 49:16–20 [49:17–21 MT]; Plummer 1896: 323; Fitzmyer 1985: 972 (noting 1 Enoch 97.8–10, which rebukes unrighteous wealth); Nickelsburg 1978–79: 334–37. See n. 11 below for the Sirach and 1 Enoch texts.

1 The dative is to be read as “for yourself” not “in yourself,” as the repetition of ψυχή in 12:23 shows; Plummer 1896: 326.

5 See Exod. 12:11 (of Israelites eating Passover); 1 Kings 18:46; 2 Kings 4:29; 9:1; Isa. 59:17; Eph. 6:14; 1 Pet. 1:13; Danker 1988: 253. Plummer 1896: 330 notes the emphatic position of ὑμῶν (your) to indicate a condition: “your loins are to be girded.”

9 For options, see BAGD 868 §4; BAA 1730; Fitzmyer 1895: 988; and Plummer 1896: 331. Josephus uses both approaches: three watches in Jewish War 5.12.2 §510 and four in Antiquities 18.9.6 §356.

10 Διορύσσω is used elsewhere at Matt. 6:19, 20; 24:43; BAGD 199; BAA 400; cf. Exod. 22:2 [22:1 MT]; Job 24:16; Jer. 2:34. The image of Jesus returning as a thief is common in the NT: 1 Thess. 5:2, 4; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3; 16:15; Grundmann 1963: 265; Plummer 1896: 331.

4 Παρῆσαν (arrived), from πάρειμι (to arrive; BAGD 624 §1a; BAA 1261 §1), refers to the crowd's arrival, not only its presence as many translations suggest; so correctly Plummer 1896: 337; Acts 10:21; 12:20; 17:6; 24:19, Marshall 1978: 553. In addition, ἀπαγγέλλω (to announce) usually refers to recent news; Marshall 1978: 553; Matt. 2:8; 28:8, 11; Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; Mark 16:10, 13; Luke 7:18; BAGD 79; BAA 157.

7 For example, Job's friends wrongly but naturally assumed that his initial travail was the consequence of some past sin: Job 4:7; 8:4, 20; 22:5; also Exod. 20:5; Prov. 10:24–25; John 9:1–3; Plummer 1896: 338; Danker 1988: 259; Manson 1949: 273.

18 The omission of the apodosis is common in Semitic style; BDF §454.4; Acts 23:9; Rom. 9:22–24; Plummer 1896: 340. The apodosis in this case reads "well and good"; Manson 1949: 275.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

16 On the figurative use of "bound" and "loosed," see Fitzmyer 1985: 1013; MM 142, 144. The length of the woman's condition is underlined by the use of the interjection ἰδού (behold). On Satan's activity, see Job 2:1–7; Acts 10:38; 1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Cor. 12:7; 1 Tim. 1:20; Plummer 1896: 343. Fitzmyer notes that the verse argues against Conzelmann's view (1960: 27–28, 80) of a "Satan-free" period during Jesus' ministry.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

18 Beasley-Murray 1986: 171–72; 1 Chron. 9:24; Ps. 96:3; 107:3 (the gathered are dispersed Jews); Isa. 2:2; 25:6–9; 40:5; 43:5–6; 45:6, 14; 49:12; 51:4; 52:10; 55:5; 56:7; 59:19; 66:19–20; Mic. 4:1–2; Zech. 2:13 [2:17 MT]; Mal. 1:11; Luke 14:15; 22:16, 29–30; Rev. 19:9; Plummer 1896: 348.

1 Plummer 1896: 353 notes that Luke has five of the seven Sabbath healings in Scripture: 4:31–37, 4:38–39, and 6:6–11 have Synoptics parallels, while 13:10–17 and 14:1–6 are unique to Luke (the other two are John 5:10 and 9:14).

4 Plummer 1896: 356 notes that two to four people could recline on a couch. SB 4:617–20 cites the variety of customs and notes another configuration with the host at the head of the table.

12 Ἀνάπειρος probably describes the severely maimed or mutilated (BAGD 59; BAA 117; LSJ 116; elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 14:21), as opposed to χωλός, which refers to all the lame (BAGD 889; BAA 1772; Plummer 1896: 359).

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

16 For the view that this is still a part of the parable, see Plummer 1896: 363, who incorrectly argues that the final remark here is not like others where Jesus is clearly marked out as speaking. Marshall 1978: 590–91 argues that the host is speaking but is pictured as the Lord. Another "hidden" parabolic application appears in 16:8b–13.

4 Συμπορεύομαι (to accompany) is Lucan, since he has three of its four NT occurrences: Luke 7:11; 14:25; 24:15; Mark 10:1; Gen. 13:5; 14:24; 18:16; Plummer 1896: 364; BAGD 780 §1; BAA 1556 §1.

26 Plummer 1896: 366 notes that three distinct settings of the salt image "may be right" in terms of its historical background. He includes Mark 9:50 in his remark. This warns us not to assume that multiple sayings on a topic must have one point of origin.

18 To speak of sinning before heaven is to acknowledge that one has sinned against God; SB 2:217. OT conceptual or idiomatic parallels are found in Exod. 10:16; 1 Sam. 7:6; 20:1; Tob. 3:3; Jdt. 5:17; Sus. 23; Plummer 1896: 374; Manson 1949: 288; Lohfink 1975. Jer. 31:18–20 shows the proper attitude of repentance. In Hos. 2:7 [2:9 MT], Israel returns to her first husband.

23 So also Plummer 1896: 375 argues that the father's warm reception prevents the son from finishing, since it is clear that he is accepted.

27 Ὅτι is used twice, first in indirect discourse ("that") and then causal ("because"); Plummer 1896: 377. Ὑγιαίνω refers to physical well-being: the younger son returned "safe and sound"; BAGD 832; BAA 1660.

7 Ἔγνων is a dramatic use of the aorist: "I have determined what I will do," which might be idiomatically rendered, "I've got it!" (Kistemaker 1980: 230–31; Burton 1900: §45; Zerwick 1963: §258). The asyndeton in the verse suggests that the idea came to him suddenly; Plummer 1896: 383.

11 This was the most popular position until recently, though it is making something of a comeback (e.g., Blomberg 1990: 244–45; Blomberg 1994; Ireland 1992: 73–82). Plummer 1896: 383 holds a quite plausible variation of this view, arguing that the steward simply lessened the excess cut he took from the debtors, a view close to the "righteous" cut option (no. 3 below), except it suggests that the steward did take something additional. The inflationary trend may suggest that the debtors knew that not all of the money was getting to the owner. Jeremias 1963a: 181 speaks of the steward covering up his previous embezzlements by the new accounting, a view that requires that the master does not have proof for his firing the steward in 16:1–2. Such an internal inconsistency in the parable is unlikely.

15 Measures in the ancient world varied somewhat, so an exact figure is uncertain; see Plummer 1896: 383 and Marshall 1978: 619. BAGD 445 places the measure of a cor at 393 liters or 10–12 bushels. Fitzmyer 1985: 1101 points out that Josephus defines κόρος variously: Antiquities 15.9.2 §314 says that it equals 10 medimnoi, while Antiquities 3.15.3 §321 says four-sevenths of a medimnos—a significant difference (a medimnos was an Attic measure that equaled about 1.5 bushels, a figure that seems very high and is thus questioned). Fitzmyer figures the amount on Josephus's smaller standard, which produces a debt of slightly more than 100 bushels, but he notes that the variation makes certainty difficult.

18 Εἰς (toward) looks to the treatment of the people of this generation; Plummer 1896: 384. The phrase οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος is found in the NT only here and in 20:34.

22 Berger 1972: 209–26 argues that the law refers to the "will of God." Schweizer 1984: 258 says the law is newly interpreted by Jesus' kingdom preaching and is valid as a moral norm (at least in some of its elements). Plummer 1896: 389 and Arndt 1956: 361 see a distinction between moral law and defunct ceremonial law.

17 Plummer 1896: 393 notes correctly that Abraham's bosom is not a synonym for paradise, but that Abraham is there shows that Lazarus is among the righteous. The image indicates the story's Jewish flavor; so also Jeremias, TDNT 5:769 n. 37, citing T. Abr. (A) 20.13–14.

6 The grammatical construction τοῦ μή plus the infinitive here means the inability to do something or to hinder something from happening; BDF §400.4; BDR §400.4.6; Plummer 1896: 398. Conceptually similar expressions are found in Luke 4:42; 24:16; Acts 10:47; 14:18; 20:20, 27.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an

Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1168–69 defends the ordinal μίαν as meaning "one," not "first" (against Plummer 1896: 407) or "very much" (against Torrey 1933: 312; Manson 1949: 142) or "just one" (against Rigaux 1970: 410).

21 Marshall 1978: 664 and Plummer 1896: 409 deny the idea of escape, arguing that the point is a prohibition against coming down to collect possessions; but are the two points mutually exclusive? The comparison with Lot's wife in 17:32 suggests an escape. Nolland 1993a: 861 argues that part of the point is a willingness to flee and leave one's possessions behind, which reinforces earlier teaching about how riches can ensnare their possessor.

25 Marshall 1978: 666 speaks of the possibility of different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 145 argues that the Lucan saying reflects Q and that Matthew moved it. But is this any better, given the double use of this saying in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25, with neither being in an eschatological context? Plummer 1896: 409 suggests that the idea was often repeated. If he is right, a special Lucan source is just as likely. The theme gives evidence of going back to Jesus through such a source.

7 This point makes it unlikely that the judge was a Gentile, but so Plummer 1896: 411 and C. A. Evans 1990: 269. On the historical background, see B. Scott 1989: 184, citing Chajes 1892, who notes that most cases were heard by one judge (though he uses late texts).

4 So the aorist passive participle σταθείς (as he stood); BAGD 382 §II.1b; BAA 775 §II.1b. The circumstantial aorist passive participle of ἵστημι is found in the NT only in Luke's writings: Luke 18:40; 19:8; Acts 2:14; 5:20; 11:13; 17:22; 25:18; 27:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1186. In the Jewish world, it was not unusual to stand and pray (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:14, 22; Plummer 1896: 416; SB 1:401–2; 2:240; Marshall 1978: 679).

8 Δὶς τοῦ σαββάτου (lit., twice per Sabbath) is a distributive genitive meaning "per week"; Mark 16:9: 1 Cor. 16:2; Plummer 1896: 417.

5 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; Ps. 34:8 [34:9 MT]; 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1; Nah. 1:7; m. ›Abot 6.3 (God and his teaching). Plummer 1896: 422 argues that a rabbi is never called good in Judaism, but this is wrong; see b. Ber. 5a; b. Ta‹an. 24b; Lachs 1987: 331 nn. 2–3.

5 Ἐγγίζω (to come near) is often used to denote approach, especially in conjunction with the preposition εἰς (to); Luke 19:29 = Matt. 21:1 = Mark 11:1; Luke 24:28; Tob. 11:1; Plummer 1896: 430. See the introduction to this unit for the possibility that this remark is a condensation of Mark 10:46 and for the linkage of Luke 18:35–43 and 19:1–10.

4 Διέρχομαι is common in Luke's writings: Luke 2:15, 35; 4:30; 5:15; 8:22; 9:6; 11:24; 17:11; 19:4; Acts 12:10; 13:6; 14:24; plus eighteen more times in Acts; BAGD 194; BAA 391; Fitzmyer 1985: 1223–24; Plummer 1896: 432.

3 This view goes back to D. F. Strauss (1972: 352–53 [orignally 1840]), as Plummer 1896: 437 notes. Ellis 1974: 221–22 holds out the possibility of two parables. Marshall 1978: 702 holds that this text supports his two-versions-of-Q theory.

21 Jeremias 1963a: 62 holds that Jesus' audience interrupted him; so also Plummer 1896: 442, who argues that the crowd thinks Jesus is spoiling the parable; so also Nolland 1993b: 916–17. Klostermann 1929: 189; Marshall 1978: 708; and Danker 1988: 309 hold that the interruption comes from attendants in the parable. If 19:26–27 maintains the parabolic perspective, and 19:27 looks as if it does, then those who react here come from within the parable and comment as a crowd to the king. Of course, since the king represents Jesus, there is no real difference in sense in the choice. If Jesus speaks, he simply gives the parable's lesson.

13 On the unusual and emphatic placement of the attributive genitive αὐτῶν (their), see Plummer 1896: 447 and BDR §271.1c n. 5.

17 On εἰ (if) with the aorist, see BDF §454.4; BDR §360.5. On aposiopesis, the breaking off of the remark because of emotion, see BDF §482; Luke 22:42; John 6:62; 12:27; Plummer 1896: 450.

19 Dodd 1947: 49 argues that all the language is from the OT, as does Gaston 1970: 359, citing a catena of verses: Jer. 8:18; 9:1; 6:14, 6, 15, 8. Manson 1949: 319–20 cites Jer. 8:18–22, although the whole of Jer. 8:13–22, along with Jer. 6:6–21 and Isa. 29:1–4, might also be relevant. See also Plummer 1896: 451–52. Tiede 1980: 68–86 challenges Gaston's view that Luke has four stages here: salvation to part of Israel, fulfillment of threat, salvation to Gentiles, and the end. He sees a theodicy in Luke–Acts, where Luke explains how Jerusalem crumbled and yet Luke argues that God still will be faithful by restoring Israel. This is quite possible, though Tiede argues for a post–a.d. 70 date for the book, which is less likely.

8 Plummer 1896: 454 notes other examples of the periphrastic ἦν διδάσκων (was teaching) are 4:31; 5:17; 13:10. Temple teaching is mentioned elsewhere in Luke 21:37; 22:53 = Mark 14:49; Marshall 1978: 722.

6 Ἵνα (so that) with the future indicative δώσουσιν (they shall give) indicates purpose and is not like classical style; BDF §396.2; Plummer 1896: 459. A minor textual variant uses the more common construction and is the result of the unusual style.

5 Seeing a rhetorical argument, Plummer 1896: 472–73 holds that Jesus condescended to current opinions—a view that has changed little since Plummer wrote.

15 Grundmann 1963: 376 argues that the question's force is "why does one say. . . ?" But this could be taken erroneously as a denial of Davidic sonship, a view that goes back to D. F. Strauss (see Plummer 1896: 473). The interrogative πῶς is better understood to press for "in what manner?"

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

15 Danker 1988: 345 and Jeremias 1966: 208–9 argue that in preparation for his coming suffering Jesus did not drink the wine. Schürmann 1952: 63–65, Plummer 1896: 495–96, and Marshall 1978: 798 argue that he did drink the wine.

19 On interpreting the action, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1401–2. Plummer 1896: 498 argues that the instruction to observe the supper came from the risen Lord later, but there is no record of such a later instruction.

7 Fitzmyer 1985: 1407 sees “independent traditions” about such a discourse at the supper, though he also notes the conceptual parallelism with John. Plummer 1896: 500 speaks of the confusion about its location within the tradition, though he argues that such contention at the meal may have occurred when the disciples chose seats at the meal. But, he argues, such contention after the footwashing is unlikely. Of course, it may be that Jesus was addressing a contention from a previous occasion. Perhaps the tradition had it in this latter location as part of the summary of what was actually said at the meal, even though Jesus said it during the meal.

25 Plummer 1896: 505 and Luce 1933: 335 make this connection, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1426 says that there is no need to do so. Nolland 1993b: 1073 suggests 2:30 a.m. for the initial crowing and notes that the reference in m. B. Qam. 7.7 forbidding chickens in Jerusalem is probably a later idealization and thus not a historical challenge to this detail.

28 The perfect passive participle γεγραμμένον (is written) refers to Scripture in Luke 18:31; 20:17; 2 Cor. 4:13. The reference is often plural, but here it is singular because it focuses on a specific passage; Plummer 1896: 506.

33 Plummer 1896: 507 and Marshall 1978: 827 see the idiom here (based on Gen. 45:28; Exod. 9:28; Deut. 3:26; 1 Kings 19:4; 1 Chron. 21:15; 1 Macc. 2:33). Doubt about its presence is expressed by Fitzmyer 1985: 1434 and Rengstorf, TDNT 3:295–96.

34 Plummer 1896: 507 and Arndt 1956: 445 note that this passage helped create the two-realms theory of papal power, one secular, the other spiritual. This doctrine was formalized by Boniface VIII in his 1302 Unam Sanctam, though it was discussed much earlier. This theory parallels the disciples' misunderstanding, but in a different direction. The disciples would use the sword to defend and gain power, but the papacy was trying to hold on to complete power.

13 On ἀπό as cause, see 19:3; 21:26; 24:41; Plummer 1896: 511.

15 Plummer 1896: 517 plausibly notes that the evening testimony would be repeated in the morning. The detail may reflect an additional Lucan source.

31 Πάντες is again peculiar to Luke: 7:35; 19:37; 20:18; Plummer 1896: 518.

6 On the syntax of ἤρξαντο (they began), which Luke often uses to speak of a fresh reaction, see 4:21; 5:21; 7:15; 12:45; 13:25; 19:37; Plummer 1896: 520; Grundmann 1963: 422. Κατηγορέω (to accuse) is used elsewhere by Luke at Luke 6:7; 23:10, 14; Acts 22:30; 24:2, 8, 13, 19; 25:5, 11, 16; 28:19; Büchsel, TDNT 3:637.

10 Luke uses Ἰουδαία for either the smaller specific region (Luke 2:4; Acts 1:8; 8:1) or the broad area (Luke 1:5; 7:17; Acts 2:9; 10:37; 11:1, 29); Plummer 1896: 521.

1 Ἐπιγινώσκω is frequently used by Luke with the sense "to thoroughly ascertain"; Luke 7:37; Acts 19:34; 22:29; 24:11; 28:1; Plummer 1896: 521. Here it almost has the force of "to discover."

6 Στάσις means "rebellion or uprising" elsewhere at Mark 15:7; Luke 23:25; Acts 19:40 (elsewhere in the NT at Acts 15:2; 23:7, 10; 24:5; Heb. 9:8; BAGD 764 §2; BAA 1526 §2). This is the only NT expression of periphrasis with ἦν (was) and an aorist participle; BDR §355.1; BDF §355.1; Plummer 1896: 526 (although א* in John 18:30 also has this construction).

11 Ἐπικρίνω can have the technical meaning "to issue a sentence" (2 Macc. 4:47; 3Macc. 4:2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1492; Plummer 1896: 527), although it was also used of determining whether a person was fit for military service or exempt from a poll tax (MM 240).

11 Filling in details of this story became popular in some circles. In the Old Latin, these two bandits are variously named Ioathas and Maggatras (Luke 23:32), Zoathan and Chammatha (Mark 15:27), or Zoathan and Camma (Matt. 27:38) (Plummer 1896: 530), while the Acts of Pilate 9 records their names as Dysmas and Gestas (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512). Still other traditions speak of Jesus falling, meeting Mary, and speaking with a women named Veronica (called Bernice in Acts of Pilate 8), who testified before Pilate because Jesus had healed her issue of blood (cf. Luke 8:43–48). See also the Arabic Infancy Gospel 23 (R. Brown 1994: 969; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.460).

13 The name Calvary comes from calvaria, the Latin translation of κρανίον; Plummer 1896: 531; Geldenhuys 1951: 613. R. Brown 1994: 938–40 discusses the location of Golgotha and decides for the traditional location associated now with the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in what is called the Christian quarter of Jerusalem. Nolland 1993b: 1145 expresses less certainty about the locale.

16 Plummer 1896: 532 notes that in the entire account four groups engage in different activities: the people watch, the leaders sneer, the soldiers mock, and the robber blasphemes. Two people from a later subunit could be added to this list: a robber exercises faith and a centurion observes injustice.

22 This is the only place where Jesus addresses a single person with ἀμὴν λέγω, though he likes the expression: 4:24; 12:37; 18:17, 29; 21:32; Plummer 1896: 535.

24 Luke uses ὡσεί (about) frequently to show approximate time; Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 24:11; cf. Acts 2:15; 3:1; 10:3, 9; 23:23). Ἤδη (already) is also frequent: Matthew uses it seven times, Mark eight times, Luke ten times, elsewhere in the NT thirty-six times; Plummer 1896: 536; Untergassmair 1980: 85 n. 372.

33 Matthew uses δοξάζω (to praise) four times, Mark once, and John twenty-three times. Of Luke's fourteen uses, five are in Acts, five are in unique Lucan material (2:20; 4:15; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15), one in agreement with Mark (5:26), and three in pericopes parallel to Mark but Mark lacks the term (5:25; 18:43; 23:47); Untergassmair 1980: 91 n. 408; Plummer 1896: 539.

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

2 Plummer 1896: 547 points out that Mark has only one figure in all three cases of numerical variation in the Gospels: the Gerasene demoniac(s), the blind man (men) at Jericho, and the angel(s) at the tomb. In Acts 1:10, two “men” are present.

10 Plummer 1896: 548 notes that most NT uses of ἔμφοβος (BAGD 257; BAA 520) are Lucan: Luke 24:37; Acts 10:4; 24:25; Rev. 11:13; cf. Luke 1:12, 29–30; 2:9. On the genitive absolute with an accusative object, see BDR §423.2.8.

18 Meals are frequent in Luke: simple meals (7:36; 11:37; 14:1), feasts (5:29), miraculous provisions (9:16), cultic meals (22:14), wedding feasts (14:8–9), and the eschatological banquet (12:37; 13:29); Osborne 1984: 123 n. 26; Plummer 1896: 556. That Jesus ate such meals with the “wrong people” is noted in 15:1 and 19:1.

24 The distributive singular καρδία indicates that the heart burned in each of them; Marshall 1978: 898; Col. 3:16; BDF §140. The periphrastic idiom pictures a running emotion; Plummer 1896: 557–58. On the sense of καρδία in Luke, see 1:51, 66; 2:19, 35, 51; 3:15; 5:22; 9:47; 24:25; Tiede 1988: 437.

27 Plummer 1896: 558 rhetorically suggests that Thomas left in the middle of Peter's and other disciples' earlier reports, while expressing his doubt, thus missing the meal that starts in 24:36. Saying that only ten were present, Arndt 1956: 491 identifies this meeting with John 20:19–24. He takes "Eleven" to be a general way to refer to the group of apostles without Judas, without insisting that all those who remained were present. If Thomas left or if the term is general, then the connection is possible. The latter is likely.

9 Ψηλαφάω occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 17:27; Heb. 12:18; 1 John 1:1 (BAGD 892; BAA 1779–80); cf. Gen. 27:12; Judg. 16:26; Ignatius, Smyrneans 3.2. Plummer 1896: 560 wonders if 1 John 1:1 knows of this event, given its use of this rare term. See also C. F. Evans 1970: 108–9.

12 Dillon 1978: 192 argues that the reference to joy is Luke's, but why Luke should be responsible for such an insertion is not clear. On the syntax of ἀπό (from) with the force of ὑπό or παρά, see BDR §210.1.1; cf. Matt. 13:44; 14:26; Luke 21:26; 22:45; Acts 12:14; Plummer 1896: 560.

13 Ἐνθάδε is a Lucan term (Acts 10:18; 16:28; 17:6; 25:17, 24); the only use outside Luke's writings is twice in John 4:15–16; Plummer 1896: 560; Marshall 1978: 903.

8 My translation of 3:21–22 is deliberately nonidiomatic in the bracketed portion above to show this point. The mention of prayer fits a decidedly Lucan emphasis: 1:10, 13; 2:36–38; 5:16; 6:12; 9:18, 28; 10:21–23; 11:2–4;

22:32, 41, 44; 23:46. Note also the parables in 18:1–8 and 11:5–13. On this theme, see Plymale 1991. Jesus' attitude of prayer shows the solemnity with which he takes the baptism.

9 Though exceptions do exist; see Jeremias 1963a: 129 and Daube 1955: 334, though his explanation that the father gave property to the younger son but not to the older is not correct, given the end of this verse. On this custom, see Horowitz 1953: 402–21 and Pö;hlmann 1979.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

31 Recent affirmation of this approach is found in Porter 1990 and noted by Blomberg 1994: 90 n. 81.

42 Schwarz 1974 sees these commendatory remarks as ironic; they are really condemnatory. This interpretation is forced and is not a possible rendering of ἐπαινέω (to praise); BAGD 281; BAA 569 (elsewhere in the NT at Rom. 15:11; 1 Cor. 11:2, 17, 22 [twice]). Also failing is Bailey's attempt (1976: 107) to argue that ἐπαινέω has eschatological force in picturing approval at the judgment. Other than the use of praise in Matt. 25:21, 34, the Gospels do not have this eschatological force, and in this Matthean context the eschatological force is clear, not inferred as it would have to be here. Porter 1990: 146–47 recognizes that the term must be positive, for the steward is commended for choosing to associate with the sons of this age, a comment dripping with bitter irony from the master. If one is to argue the irony position, this is the best way to do it. Against it, however, is the comparison in 16:8–9, which makes the steward look like a positive example through the commendation, not a negative one.

3 The case for this approach is enhanced syntactically if ἐγγίζω can mean "to be in the vicinity of" rather than "to draw near," as Porter 1992 argues.

16 BAGD 471 (with bibliography); BAA 957; Van Der Loos 1965: 465–68; Michaelis, TDNT 4:233–34; Harrison, NIDNTT 2:463–66; SB 4:745–63; Pousma 1975: 138–39. Λέπρα occurs in the NT only in Matt. 8:3 = Mark 1:42 = Luke 5:12–13. A related term, λεπρός, appears in Luke 4:27; 7:22; 17:12; Matt. 8:2; 10:8; 11:5; 26:6; Mark 1:40; 14:3.

23 M. Power 1912 mentions this approach, while Cortés and Gatti 1970 and Bover 1951 suppose that the missing saying was that Jesus told his parents he would remain in Jerusalem, but they had not understood him on that point.

2 Danker 1988: 275 cites F. Preisigke's edition of an ancient letter in which an impecunious son pleads with his mother to be received back into the family: "I am writing to tell you I am naked. I plead with you, forgive me. I know well enough what I have done to myself. I have learned my lesson."

13 On εὑρίσκω in the NT, see Preisker, TDNT 2:769.

5 See the exegesis of 19:29 for detail on the Mount of Olives. Luke 21:37 mentions Jesus' custom of lodging at the Mount of Olives; Preisker, TDNT 2:373.

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

20 Procksch, TDNT 4:328 n. 3; Creed 1930: 41. Bovon 1989: 143 n. 35 adds Sophocles, Antigone 1268, 1314.

17 Procksch underplays, however, the messianic sense of the title. Note especially 1:35.

12 Many follow Ranke 1901: 1.1–9 in seeing this saying as Jesus' most significant political statement. Fitzmyer 1985: 1292 objects to the two-kingdoms view (which appeals to Prov. 8:15–16; Dan. 2:21, 37–38; Wis. 6:1–11 for support), arguing that it makes Caesar and God equals.

1 Bovon 1989: 30 n. 1 notes that these comparisons with ancient prologues date back to the eighteenth century with G. Raphelius and J. J. Wettstein. C. F. Evans 1990: 116–19 cites several of these "scientific prefaces."

3 Reicke 1968: 228–34. On these distinctions, see Sherwin-White 1963: 1–23 (who cites a variety of relevant ancient texts); C. F. Evans 1990: 233; Tacitus, Annals 15.25.

4 Reicke 1968: 138, 228–29. F. F. Bruce 1972: 16–17 notes that the term procurator is later than this period, coming into use with the emperor Claudius (41–54).

5 Reicke 1968: 183–84 lists the key reasons for a 33 date: (1) the year of Herod Antipas's divorce, which John criticizes, is probably 32 and (2) the removal of the anti-Semitic dictator Sejanus by Tiberius in 31 made Pilate treat the Jews with more sympathy. See also Hoehner 1977: 95–111 and the sources and historicity section of 23:6–12.

1 For solid overviews of this area, see McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987. McKnight is slightly more confident than I am of Marcan priority, though I still regard it likely that Mark was the first Gospel written. Still, his and Stein's overviews show why many think Mark's Gospel is first. For a comparative study of the two major options in the debate, see Bellinzoni, Tyson, and Walker 1985 and Dungan 1990. A study making significant points about Q and the complex interrelationship of the Gospel writers is Reicke 1986. For the case for Matthean priority, see Farmer 1964.

14 Note also the Gospel of Thomas 33. This repetition shows that Luke is not averse to repeating sayings and also suggests that he is aware that certain sayings were said by Jesus in different settings with slightly differing force. The possibility of the tradition having several such duplications cannot be excluded. Not every parallel is a genuine overlap, but might be what has been called "alibi analogies," where the saying looks like a parallel, but really is not (see Reicke 1968: 26–30 for a detailed discussion).

5 Despite the current consensus, the case for a.d. 33 is strong (Reicke 1968: 183–84). For the connection to other chronological issues in Jesus' life, see excursus 3.

14 Rengstorf, TDNT 8:543; also Michaelis, TDNT 5:348, 373. Luke will call these men “witnesses” later in Luke–Acts (Luke 24:44–48; Acts 1:8). Such eyewitnesses were important to ancient historians: Thucydides 1.22.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §55; and Lucian’s parody in How to Write History 4. See Du Plessis 1974: 265.

16 Rengstorf, TDNT 4:435 n. 152. Bovon 1989: 157 believes that the probable locale is the portico of Solomon (Acts 3:11; 5:12, 21, 25).

21 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:330, says that Peter is regarded as a sinner “by the community.” Van Der Loos 1965: 671 agrees with the above assessment of the fishing occupation, while Schürmann 1969: 270 n. 54 disagrees, noting that no evidence exists for this view of fishermen in the first century; so also SB 1:187. Schürmann is surely right here.

68 Guelich 1982: 412, 404; Marshall 1978: 275; Rengstorf, TDNT 6:603. For βροχή (only in Matt. 7:25, 27 in the NT), see BAGD 147 and BAA 294.

6 On the idea of ἀποστέλλω not referring to a special commission, see Rengstorf, TDNT 1:403–4. The main reason for rejecting a commission is that the simpler synonym πέμπω is used in 7:10.

34 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327; Michel, TDNT 8:104. On Jesus and table fellowship, see Stählin, TDNT 9:161.

6 Plummer 1896: 210 suggests that she is a prostitute, citing Matt. 21:32 as support. Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327, says that this interpretation of the terminology fits rabbinic expression, but gives no specifics at this point; Rengstorf’s article shows ἁμαρτωλός to refer to a wide variety of the ungodly, including the Sadducees (m. Ketub. 7.6).

11 On seven as denoting severe possession, see Marshall 1978: 316; Rengstorf, TDNT 2:630–31; cf. Mark 5:9.

2 The suggestion that λόγους (words, matters) refers to the recent miraculous events (so Rengstorf 1968: 126) is to be rejected, since γάρ looks ahead.

1 On NT structures with the use of "seven," see Rengstorf, TDNT 2:632 §B4d. On other points of Lucan structure, see Nolland 1989: 168 and Goulder 1989: 283–90.

13 Manson 1949: 83–84. Friedrich, TDNT 6:847, argues that the office of eschatological prophet was the issue. Matthew's discussion of David seems to envision something more; for a discussion of the test, Rengstorf, TDNT 7:234.

17 The phrase οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν refers to "your own people" (Arndt 1956: 300), although most see it as referring to the "sons of the Pharisees" (Rengstorf, TDNT 4:443) or more broadly to "countrymen" (Godet 1875: 2.64) (see BAGD 833 §1cα; BAA 1663 §1cα; Heb. 12:5; 1 Pet. 5:13). Nolland 1993a: 639 states the question this way: "What will other Jewish exorcists, in light of their own exorcizing activity, make of such a view?" For a different (and I think more preferable) view, see n. 19 below.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1

Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

6 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327, speaks of ἁμαρτωλοί as murderers, robbers, deceivers, and those of dishonorable vocation, which would include tax collectors; also Herrenbrück 1981.

10 Rengstorf 1967 suggests as allusion to the Jewish custom of qēṣ;āṣ;â (קְצָצָה), which cut off from society a member who sold a family heirloom to an outsider or who married beneath their social rank (Jastrow 1903: 1407–8). There is no indication that such a custom applies here, though Rengstorf's study does show the parable's social context and background in terms of the familial symbolism of the ring and robe in 15:22. For refutation, see Marshall 1978: 606 and Bailey 1976: 167–68.

33 Plummer 1896: 507 and Marshall 1978: 827 see the idiom here (based on Gen. 45:28; Exod. 9:28; Deut. 3:26; 1 Kings 19:4; 1 Chron. 21:15; 1 Macc. 2:33). Doubt about its presence is expressed by Fitzmyer 1985: 1434 and Rengstorf, TDNT 3:295–96.

20 Sloan 1977: 39–41; Rese 1969: 219. Isa. 58 has Sabbath imagery, while Isa. 61 has Jubilee imagery.

15 Levey 1974 lists the Jewish passages. Rowley 1950 has a full discussion of the historical issues. Jeremias, TDNT 5:677–700, is more optimistic in his appraisal of this theme in Judaism, but most note that his sources are later than the first century; see Rese 1963. See the discussion of Isa. 53 in the exegesis of Luke 22:37.

17 For a study of the hermeneutic of Luke's OT use, see Bock 1987, in which I build on P. Schubert's 1957 thesis that Luke's theme is "proof from prophecy" (but the apologetic motif is not so strong in Luke as the declarative function of these texts, thus my modification to "proclamation from prophecy and pattern"). My work contrasts with that of Rese 1969, who underestimates the appeal to pattern and therefore understates a prophetic approach to Luke's OT. Soards 1994: 201 misconstrues the proof-from-prophecy position by describing it as linear, which does not reflect my view of the interaction between text and event in the proclamation-from-prophecy-and-pattern theme; see Bock 1987: 273.

3 For the debate about its ending, see Egelkraut 1976: 3–11 and Resseguie 1975: 3 (a good survey of the history of interpretation).

4 The amount of material in these groups can be variously measured, depending on the division of the pericopes and one's judgment about the presence of parallels. Egelkraut 1976: 27 bases the percentages in Luke's central section (for him 9:51–19:48) on the pericope delineation in two common synopses:

	Lucan Parallels to Matthew (i.e., Q)	Unique Lucan Material	Lucan Parallels to Mark
Aland 1985	26 of 75 pericopes (35%)	27 of 75 pericopes (36%)	22 of 75 pericopes (29%)
Huck and Lietzmann 1936	25 of 60 pericopes (42%)	24 of 60 pericopes (40%)	11 of 60 pericopes (18%)

Resseguie 1975: 4 calculates the same section this way: of 60 Lucan pericopes, 31 (52%) parallel Matthew/Q and 29 (48%) are uniquely Lucan. Resseguie argues that only one-tenth of the material in 9:51–18:14 has even a possible Marcan connection. Teaching material that is capable of being repeated might slightly alter the exact count. Nonetheless, the numbers of Huck-Lietzmann and Resseguie are closer to the real percentages, since Luke 9:51–18:14 lacks any significant Marcan parallels. In addition, most of the Q pericopes and unique Lucan material are long units. Conceptual overlap with Matthew and unique Lucan material abound (see the introduction in vol. 1, pp. 10–12). Goulder (1989: 455) notes that in 9:51–13:21 one of every three words comes from Q or L, while in 13:22–18:14 (where Goulder ends the unit) one in six words comes from this material.

7 Resseguie 1975 puts five of fourteen possible interpretations in this category. C. F. Evans 1990: 433 points out the lack of chronological notes, especially at the end of the section. Vague indications of time and place are provided only in the beginning of the section: 9:52, 56–57; 10:1, 21, 38; 11:14, 27; 13:10, 31; 14:1, 25. Schürmann 1994: 1 speaks of a metaphorical journey account in which Jesus goes his way to Jerusalem as an itinerant prophetic teacher who divides Israel. On Luke's use of journey and way terminology, see Schneider 1977a: 227.

39 This seems similar to a view that Bovon 1989: 318–19 calls the existential view, held by R. Bultmann, P. Ricoeur, and M. Buber. Practically speaking, it leads to a cosmopolitan philanthropy. This kind of activity might be an implication of this passage, but it is hardly the point.

23 Schürmann 1969: 117 n. 160; Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:151; B. Meyer 1964: 43. The remark argues that the events, like revelation of an apocalyptic secret, transcend human understanding and require reflection.

36 Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:147; Schürmann 1969: 306 n. 48; Bovon 1989: 274 n. 24; Ps. 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; Dan. 6:12 (with τηρέω); BAGD 622 §1aβ; BAA 1258 §1aβ. Today, παρατηρέω (to watch lurkingly) makes one think of a spy novel.

56 On ὑπέρ as a comparative meaning "greater than," see Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:515; BAGD 839 §2; BAA 1672 §2.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that "in your midst" is not possible. Schlosser 1980: 1.202–4 argues that "in one's power" is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for "in the midst of." His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1168–69 defends the ordinal μίαν as meaning "one," not "first" (against Plummer 1896: 407) or "very much" (against Torrey 1933: 312; Manson 1949: 142) or "just one" (against Rigaux 1970: 410).

4 On the history of this discussion, including the church fathers and the various views, see Orchard and Riley 1987. Goulder's detailed 1989 work is unique, arguing that the order is Mark–Matthew–Luke, but that Luke used only Mark and Matthew, not Q. One of the goals of his study is to challenge the existence of Q.

7 Guthrie 1970 deals with these issues from a conservative, evangelical viewpoint, while the introduction of Kümmel 1975 serves as a good survey of common critical approaches to these issues. See the introduction on "Sources" for these issues as they relate to Luke. Orchard and Riley 1987 detail the ancient testimony of the church on this question.

5 Rist 1978. J. Wenham 1992b: 223 dates Matthew in 42, Mark in 45, and Luke in 55 at the latest—dates that are much earlier than typically assigned to the Gospels. Most conservatives place the Synoptics in the sixties, while most others have dates ranging from 60 to 90.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that "in your midst" is not possible. Schlosser 1980: 1.202–4 argues that "in one's power" is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for "in the midst of." His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

25 Robertson believes that Luke may have been an eyewitness to some events, but the language of the earlier verses makes this unlikely for the events in Luke's Gospel. The "we" sections of Acts are another matter.

22 BDF §333; Hendriksen 1978: 108, 112 defends this sense and cites Robertson 1923: 836–37, though Robertson says "maybe" to this view. For Grigsby 1984: 167 n. 29, this force is impossible, and he notes that the BDF discussion of the gnomic aorist does not mention the Magnificat. He apparently failed to read the fine-print portion of §333.2, where the hymn is mentioned. His omission undercuts the key reason he offers for rejecting a pre-Christian setting for the hymn.

6 On this passage and various views on the authenticity issue, see also Roloff 1970: 55–62; Lohse, TDNT 7:21–24; Lohse 1960: 84–85; Daube 1972–73: 7–8; and France 1971: 46–47.

20 So Cadbury 1956–57: 131, who argues that the meaning “to investigate” is unattested in Greek; so also Ropes 1923–24: 70–71; Luce 1933: 82; Maddox 1982: 4–5; and RSV. Cadbury’s argument has roots in an earlier article (1922b), where he notes the six possibilities for the verb.

15 Levey 1974 lists the Jewish passages. Rowley 1950 has a full discussion of the historical issues. Jeremias, TDNT 5:677–700, is more optimistic in his appraisal of this theme in Judaism, but most note that his sources are later than the first century; see Rese 1963. See the discussion of Isa. 53 in the exegesis of Luke 22:37.

20 On the various views, see the summary in Marshall 1978: 805–6, who argues that in general Luke’s form is the most primitive, but notes the difficulty of the decision. Fitzmyer 1985: 1402 prefers Mark’s originality, as does Nolland 1993b: 1047, who mostly follows Ruckstuhl 1980.

19 The preposition ἐκ here means “by means of”; Fitzmyer 1985: 1109; Rüger 1973.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that “in your midst” is not possible. Schlosser 1980: 1.202–4 argues that “in one’s power” is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for “in the midst of.” His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

17 Any charge today that dispensationalism sees two ways of salvation or sees too great a law/grace contrast in the sermon grossly misrepresents where many of its adherents are now. Such a monolithic view of dispensationalism fails to see the variations that have long been a part of this approach. Gerstner 1991 irresponsibly engages in such confusion and minimizes the significance of such differences, which dispensationalists like C. C. Ryrie and J. D. Pentecost have long noted. Gerstner's charge of antinomianism is a distortion that warps his ability to appreciate the distinctions in the movement. The charge also underestimates the significance of the current discussion about the function of the law within covenant theology, as well as its debate with theonomy; see D. Turner 1991; J. Martin 1986; and J. Martin 1992.

13 Lev. 21:7, 14 discusses the laws regarding priestly marriages and restricts the priests to virgins (Marshall 1978: 52). SB 2:68–71 notes that this type of priestly union was encouraged; Plummer 1896: 9. For ancient Jewish rules of marriage, including reference to some Jewish texts after the first century, see G. Moore 1927–30: 2.119–22 and Safrai 1976a: 752–60.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

10 SB 1:45–47; m. Ketub. 4.4–5; Jeremias 1969: 364–67; Safrai 1976a: 752–60. The mishnaic text is suggestive for Matt. 1, since the initial realization of her pregnancy might suggest that Mary should be punished (Deut. 22:23–26) or, more leniently, be betrothed, given that premarital intercourse could result in betrothal (Deut. 22:28–29). Cases of rape were handled differently (Deut. 22:25–27).

23 Hendriksen 1978: 144–45. On the ancient house, though inns are not explicitly discussed, see Safrai 1976a: 728–35.

4 Fitzmyer 1981: 524 has a bibliography on the synagogue. See also Safrai 1976c; C. F. Evans 1990: 264–65.

17 Schrage, TDNT 7:810–26, 828–33; Schürer 1973–87: 2.423–63, esp. 447–54; Safrai 1976c: 927–33; Billerbeck 1964.

4 On women and the synagogue, see Safrai 1976c: 919–20; m. Ber. 3.3. Midr. ha-Gadol on Deut. 29:10 [29:11 MT] pictures women and children receiving teaching by hearing the readings of the Targums. Safrai notes that these late rabbinic texts are confirmed by Acts 16:13 and 17:4. Schweizer 1984: 222 is thus wrong to suggest that the woman is outside the synagogue.

72 Marshall 1978: 62, citing Sahlin 1945a: 96–97. Klostermann 1929: 11 cites B. Weiss, while he seemingly rejects the view.

24 Michel, TDNT 8:94–105; M. Stern 1974: 330–34; Donahue 1971; Fitzmyer 1981: 469–70; Badian 1972. E. Sanders 1992: 146–69 notes that the tax system in Palestine was not more oppressive than in other regions. He estimates that taxes consumed somewhere between 20 percent and 30 percent of one's income. For a more skeptical view that sees toll collectors as a symbolic representation of Jesus' outreach to archetypal sinners, see Neale 1991: 110–15. I regard Neale's dichotomy between symbolic representation and history as false for reasons made clear below. In this approach Neale follows Horsley 1987, and both underestimate the connections between John and Jesus in terms of audience. See also 5:29–32.

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are “common people.” He sees Jesus’ offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with “common people,” see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus’ effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God’s grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

11 Washings took place before and after the meal. According to later tradition in the Talmud, only the washing after the meal was commanded by the Torah, the other was commanded by the rabbis; b. Ḥul. 105a. What is unclear is whether such rules applied to all meals or just to Sabbath and festival meals (y. Ber. 12a [8.2–3] [= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.284–91]);

the real issue here is meals on the eve of Sabbath or at festival. E. Sanders 1990: 31 argues that there is no evidence of washing before every meal. Evidently the Pharisees' concern for contracting impurity from a dead swarming thing in liquid (Lev. 11:31–38) caused them to expand the biblical injunctions. But such a danger was not limited to the Sabbath or festal meals. As such, it is likely that such care was present at every meal. Booth 1986: 119–50, 194–203 cites t. Dem. 2.11–12 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.84) as key evidence.

12 The issue for some Jews was to avoid "fly-impurity," contact with a dead swarming thing from water, which if present, made the hands unclean. Just to be sure, the cup's outside and inside was washed; E. Sanders 1990: 29–42; t. Ber. 5.26 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.31). On Jewish cup tradition, see Maccoby 1982.

18 Three main OT texts deal with the tithe (E. Sanders 1990: 43–45). (1) According to Deut. 14:22–27, ten percent of farm produce, oil, and wine was to be tithed, except in the seventh year (Lev. 25:2–7). It was to be spent and enjoyed in Jerusalem or another appropriate locale. Every third year, this tithe was given to the Levites and the needy (Deut. 14:28–29). Whether "third year" meant only the third of the seven-year cycle or years three and six was debated, but the latter view was more popular. (2) Lev. 27:30–33 required that ten percent of crops and animals be tithed to the priesthood (Josephus, Antiquities 4.4.4 §§69–75). (3) Num. 18:21–32 declared that food be set aside for the Levites and their families. Other OT passages that give the background of tithes are Deut. 12:6–9; 26:12–15; Num. 18:12;

Neh. 10:37–38 [10:38–39 MT]; 12:44; 13:5, 12; 2 Chron. 31:5–12; Fitzmyer 1985: 948.

20 In fact, in many traditions “overshadowing” such a corpse rendered one unclean; E. Sanders 1990: 33–35. Pharisees were particularly sensitive to this issue (Num. 19:11–22; Lev. 21:1–3; m. Dem. 2.3), as were the Essenes at Qumran (CD 12.15–18). This was a common Jewish concept; Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.3 §§36–38.

2 Sanders correctly calls this action blasphemous from a Jewish point of view. He is right not to decry the presence of money changers per se, since sacrifices and payment of the temple tax were required at the temple (i.e., sacrifices had to be unblemished, and a long trip might injure the sacrificial animal). Sanders, however, too quickly dismisses Jesus’ Son-of-Man reply at his trial (22:69), for this remark was also blasphemous to Jews (Sanders is guilty of either/or thinking, when both/and applies). Luke ignores the temple issue at the trial and focuses on Jesus’ person. Rejecting that Jesus purifies the temple, E. Sanders 1985: 61–71 holds that Jesus simply pictures its approaching destruction. But to put forth this view, Sanders must deny the authenticity of the OT sayings and argue that the “house of prayer for Gentiles” is impossible for this early historical context. Isaiah 56:6 refers, however, to worshiping foreigners who are also the subjects in 56:7. The saying is authentic, looking to the day when all nations will gather to worship God in Jerusalem, a key OT prophetic hope (Isa. 2:2–4; 19:23–25).

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War

6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

5 The temple area was large (over 100 yards by 150 yards), so if Jesus acted quickly, there may have been little time to react. In addition, he may have intended only a prophetic sign, not a comprehensive cleansing. A brief symbolic action may have sufficed to express his intent, as even E. Sanders 1985: 70 acknowledges. Witherington 1990: 109–10 notes six historical questions that influence this passage and argue for its plausibility. One of the most basic is, Why invent such an event? Nolland 1993b: 935–36 notes nine views on this issue and opts for a modest, symbolic action against long-standing temple practice (pace Eppstein 1964) that thwarted true worship and called for purification, if not temple replacement.

6 For a methodological assessment of this debate, see R. Miller 1991. Sanders is unaware of Eppstein's 1964 article (see n. 1). Some in Judaism saw the temple as corrupt; 1 Enoch 89.73–90.29; 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.1–12. Meier 1994: 886 rightly calls the cleansing "prophetic action," but opts for a rejection of the temple rather than a cleansing. This ignores the connection to Isa. 56.

4 J. Green 1988: 282 calls Luke the most primitive form of the tradition. Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–59 is agnostic on historicity, saying that it is impossible to prove. The most detailed English study, Catchpole 1971: 153–

220, gives the nod to Luke. For a more skeptical appraisal, giving seven reasons not to accept these accounts as authentic, see E. Sanders 1985: 296–99. For a detailed response to most of his objections, see Bock 1994b. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 392–93) rejects Jesus' prediction (22:61) and the trial dialogue (22:67–69, 70) as inauthentic because 22:61 recalls 22:34 and the absence of disciples at the trial means that no witnesses were present. Jesus' anticipation of Peter's failure, however, reflects his knowledge of how pressure would cause Peter to wilt (the disciples' past record of inconsistency might also contribute to Jesus' expectation). The presence of people like Joseph of Arimathea at the trial makes an internal witness possible.

28 This background to the blasphemy charge and the real possibility of ancient sources show that E. Sanders's basic objections (1985: 296–99) do not merit acceptance. His remaining key objections related to the timing of the trials were dealt with in the exegesis of 22:54, 66. For a full response, see Bock 1994b.

29 E. Sanders 1990: 65 argues that this distinction renders suspect that Jesus was charged because of this reply. On the Son-of-Man title, see excursus 6 and Bock 1991c.

22 For details, see Bock 1987: 319 n. 68; J. A. Sanders 1975: 80–81. The idea of anointing, the establishment of justice, and the picture of restoration are shared in Isa. 42:1, 3–4; 49:4, 7; 61:1–2. Tg. Isa. 61:1 clearly reads the text this way: "The spirit of prophecy from before Lord Elohim is upon me." But it is wrong to read the OT passage as only about Isaiah, as C. F. Evans 1990: 269 does. Salvation in Isaiah is depicted in terms of God's exodus pattern and is too comprehensive to refer only to Isaiah. Judaism was right to read the text ultimately in terms of the eschaton. This is another typologically fulfilled text like Luke 3:4–6; see the discussion of typology there.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

27 J. A. Sanders 1975: 83–88, where he mentions six passages, three of which have an eschatological focus: Lam. Rab. 3.9 on 3:49–50, Yalqut ha-Makhiri on Isa. 61:1, and Tg. Ps.-J. Num. 25:12, where Isa. 61 is linked with Mal. 3:1.

1 Bovon 1989: 357–58 notes the OT similarities (returning the son to the parent, the widow, and recognition that God's messenger is present) and differences (Jesus' taking the initiative, instantaneous resuscitation, and the crowd's response). Bovon references the key study of this passage by Harbarth 1978. For the connections to 1 Kings, see Brodie 1986, though he overdraws the case for framing around this OT book. The differences between the OT and the event reveal that the event controls the details (see C. A. Evans 1990: 115 and Evans in Evans and Sanders 1993: 223–24).

4 Marshall 1978: 405 notes that the Hebrew idiom may suggest a source behind Luke's remarks. Appealing to Ezek. 6:2; 13:17; 15:7; 20:46 [21:2 MT], C. A. Evans 1987a argues that the force is "to dispatch," a view possible for the term but awkward for this context. In a reworking of this article in Evans and Sanders 1993: 93–105, Evans makes less of the lexical argument and argues for an allusion to Ezek. 21:2–6 [21:7–11 MT], with the implication that with the journey comes not only destined suffering for Jesus but also judgment for Israel (he also adds Ezek. 25:2; 28:21; 29:2; and 38:2, while emphasizing the parallel in 20:46 [21:2 MT]; p. 100). If so, then Jesus' act is like that of the prophet and has a place in the divine drama of Israel's history. This view is possible, but not certain. For a denial of judgment here, see Giblin 1985: 31–32.

28 Moessner 1989: 127, 131, 176, 211 details this view. J. A. Sanders 1974 and C. A. Evans 1990: 166–69 tie the portrait to the themes of election and the true people of God. C. F. Evans 1955 is responsible for raising the connection to Deuteronomy and argues for it throughout his commentary (1990: 34–37, 435).

33 Cf. "times of the age" in Tob. 14:4–5 and "season of visitation" in 1QS 4.18–19. C. A. Evans 1990: 313 notes that this hope is a decisive argument against J. T. Sanders's claim (1987: 216–19) that Luke is anti-Semitic (he does see a future time when Israel will have a key role).

32 On εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας as a plural expression that stresses eternality, see Sasse, TDNT 1:199. For the grammar of the phrase, see BDR §141.1.3.

9 Friedrich, TDNT 2:721. The tie between humans and good news appears in a variety of texts: Matt. 26:13; 28:19; Acts 1:8; Mark 14:9; 16:15; Sasse, TDNT 3:890.

16 Sasse, TDNT 3:888 §C3a; Michel, TDNT 5:158; Bovon 1989: 199 n. 35. Κ όσμος is found in Luke 9:25; 11:50; 12:30; and Acts 17:24.

37 Though millennium is not a Lucan term, it is used to describe the earthly character of this future rule; Bock 1992a. The kingdom of God in Luke refers to a total program—promised in the OT and detailed in the NT—that is inaugurated and then realized in stages. There are not two different kingdoms offered during Jesus' ministry: one before rejection like the OT earthly kingdom and another more spiritually focused kingdom offered after Israel's rejection. Jesus always offered the same kingdom. It was always coming in two stages, since Jesus' suffering and rejection by his own were in the OT design (Isa. 52:13–53:12). This view is contra Saucy 1994 and his explanation of Matthew. To make his distinction work, Saucy underplays the kingdom of heaven/God language and its implication in Matt. 18:1, 3–4, 23; 19:12, 14, 23–24; 21:31, 43; 23:13; esp. the parable introduced in 20:1—texts that come after Israel's rejection. The kingdom to come is the full kingdom, with Israel possessing a central role. But the present kingdom is grounded in the messianic hope presented in Ps. 110:1 and 132:11, 17 (Acts 2:14–41; Eph. 1:19–23; 4:7–10). The arrival of the Spirit is the sign of the arrival of the Christ and his kingdom with blessing (Luke 3:15–18; 24:49; Acts 2:30–36). One should be careful about stating Matthew's theology without reflecting on how the Book of Acts contributes canonically to the biblical teaching about the church and the kingdom. The change in emphasis within Matthew's kingdom portrait does show the changing role for Israel in that program during the church era.

13 Lev. 21:7, 14 discusses the laws regarding priestly marriages and restricts the priests to virgins (Marshall 1978: 52). SB 2:68–71 notes that this type of priestly union was encouraged; Plummer 1896: 9. For ancient Jewish rules of marriage, including reference to some Jewish texts after the first century, see G. Moore 1927–30: 2.119–22 and Safrai 1976a: 752–60.

20 Leaney 1958: 80; SB 2:71. Gen. Rab. 38.14 on 11:29–30 attributes the remark to Rabbi Levi, an ascription that dates the remark to ca. A.D. 300.

51 1 Enoch 40.9 names four angels: Michael, Raphael, Gabriel (the angel of strength), and Phanuel (alternately called Uriel); 1 Enoch 20 names these four as well as Saraqael, Raguel, and Suruel (Gabriel is described as caring for the Garden of Eden and the cherubim). See Tob. 12:15; Fitzmyer 1981: 327–28; Bousset 1926: 325–31; SB 2:89–97.

10 SB 1:45–47; m. Ketub. 4.4–5; Jeremias 1969: 364–67; Safrai 1976a: 752–60. The mishnaic text is suggestive for Matt. 1, since the initial realization of her pregnancy might suggest that Mary should be punished (Deut. 22:23–26) or, more leniently, be betrothed, given that premarital intercourse could result in betrothal (Deut. 22:28–29). Cases of rape were handled differently (Deut. 22:25–27).

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

5 R. Brown 1977: 369; SB 4:23–40. M. Šab. 19.5 indicates that circumcision could take place between the eighth and twelfth days. So important was this act that rabbinic texts speculated why it had not been included among the Ten Commandments; Pesikta Rabbati 23.4 (= Braude 1968: 479).

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

18 Michel, TDNT 5:129; Jeremias, TDNT 5:681 n. 184, 700; SB 4:213. Lohse, TDNT 8:481, cites the Jewish benediction; cf. also pp. 482, 485.

25 SB 1:892; Schweizer 1984: 42; Plummer 1896: 41. One could argue that the figure means “for the sake of the fathers,” but this rendering seems too soft in light of the belief that the righteous experience resurrection (16:19–31).

15 Only one LXX context refers to Bethlehem as David’s city: 1 Sam. 20:6 (“his city”). David’s connection with Bethlehem is noted in the MT of 1 Sam. 17:12, 58, but these verses are absent from the LXX; 1 Sam. 16:18 LXX connects the city with Jesse, not David. Even Judaism did not have a Bethlehem-Davidic-Messianic connection; SB 1:82–83; Plummer 1896: 52; Bock 1987: 75.

18 Jer. 31:31–33 [as writing the law on the heart]; Joel 2:28–32 [3:1–5 MT]; 1QS 4.21–22; Danker 1988: 64; SB 2:126–27; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:816–20, 826–27. On the view of some in ancient Judaism that the Spirit’s revelatory work ceased sometime before the Maccabean period, see 1 Macc. 9:27; 14:41.

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

9 Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; Matt. 3:7 [the parallel to this pericope]; Luce 1933: 110; Danker 1988: 86; SB 1:114–15; Foerster, TDNT 2:815–16. Acts 28:3 refers to a poisonous snake.

14 O. Betz, TDNT 9:288–90, 298. Some cite Tg. Song 2:12; SB 1:123–24, but Sjöberg, TDNT 6:382, notes that the Spirit never appears in the form of a dove in rabbinic writings.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB 1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

21 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:330, says that Peter is regarded as a sinner “by the community.” Van Der Loos 1965: 671 agrees with the above assessment of the fishing occupation, while Schürmann 1969: 270 n. 54 disagrees, noting that no evidence exists for this view of fishermen in the first century; so also SB 1:187. Schürmann is surely right here.

16 BAGD 471 (with bibliography); BAA 957; Van Der Loos 1965: 465–68; Michaelis, TDNT 4:233–34; Harrison, NIDNTT 2:463–66; SB 4:745–

63; Pousma 1975: 138–39. Λέπρα occurs in the NT only in Matt. 8:3 = Mark 1:42 = Luke 5:12–13. A related term, λεπρός, appears in Luke 4:27; 7:22; 17:12; Matt. 8:2; 10:8; 11:5; 26:6; Mark 1:40; 14:3.

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are "common people." He sees Jesus' offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with "common people," see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus' effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God's grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where

God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

27 Fitzmyer 1981: 609. Josephus, Antiquities 6.12.1 §§242–43, does not mention the bread in describing the account. SB 1:618–19 notes the rabbinic accounts; b. Menaḥ. 95b cites a remark by Rabbi Shim<on (ca. A.D.. 150).

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

5 The talmudic text is late, but that the woman in Luke is allowed in makes it likely that this was the custom. B. Ber. 31b relates a parable of a poor man who requests food from a king, suggesting a form of limited access, since he was able to force his way in to see the king (SB 4:615; Jülicher 1899: 2.291). However, it must be admitted that the parallel is distant. B. Ber. 41b relates an exchange between rabbis during a meal, but it is not clear that anyone else is there to hear it. Also relevant is b. B. Bat. 8a, where during a famine a rabbi opens his home to students, but not to the unlearned. When chastised by another rabbi for this, the rabbi relents and allows all to enter. The dilemma of the rabbinic passage is whether one should be generous. Thus, the extrabiblical evidence for an open meal is not great. Still, within the text the evidence suggests such an occasion.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 696; SB 2:164; Wiefel 1988: 157–58. Grundmann 1963: 174 notes that women could not go into the synagogue or say the Shema‘. The late Tosepta text just cited gives the remark of a Jewish leader who rejoices that he is not a pagan, a woman, or unlearned. See also Leipoldt 1955: 69–114 and Witherington 1979.

13 BAGD 303; BAA 615; LSJ 669; Josephus, Jewish War 1.24.6 §487; Antiquities 18.6.6 §194; SB 2:164; Marshall 1978: 317; Fitzmyer 1981: 698; Hoehner 1972: 120, 303–5, 317 n. 4.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as “legendary.” He suggests a cure by “auto-suggestion,” a rationalistic description that rejects the account’s portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of “grace” as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

12 John 6:9 mentions barley loaves. On this kind of food, see Van Der Loos 1965: 622 n. 3. SB 1:683–84 notes that barley bread was not well liked.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

12 In late Judaism, Moses and Elijah are linked eschatologically in Deut. Rab. 3.17 on 10:1; SB 1:756; Schürmann 1969: 557.

6 For a similar intimate linkage of Jesus and God, see Luke 10:16; John 17:3, 18. To receive an emissary is to receive the person who sends the emissary; m. Ber. 5.5 ("a man's emissary is like the man himself"); Philem. 15–18; SB 1:590; Fitzmyer 1981: 817.

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

5 SB 2:155 gives it only a "perhaps," while Geldenhuys 1951: 154 rejects it.

5 On Jewish "works of love" and for the key ancient texts, see Egelkraut 1976: 139 nn. 3, 5; SB 1:487–88; 4:578–92; Hengel 1981: 8–10 and n. 21.

Quick burials are mentioned in Acts 5:5–6, 10; John 11:1, 14, 17. On Jewish burial customs, see the exegesis of Luke 7:12. The OT notes periods that might demand that burial not take place, e.g., the time of exile (Jer. 16:5–7; Ernst 1977: 321).

7 Fitzmyer notes that there is no evidence for this third view, which goes back to Perles 1919–20; see also Black 1967: 207–8. SB 1:489 rejects the suggestion.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

22 See Matthew's synonymous phrase child of the kingdom (Matt. 13:38). Child of peace focuses on what one has, while child of the kingdom describes where one resides. Danker 1960–61; Klassen 1980–81. SB 2:166 notes parallel Semitic phrases like child of power, child of knowledge, child of Haggadah, and child of the future world.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157;

Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

10 Egelkraut 1976: 154 n. 5 notes that none of SB's examples are about prayer. Although 17:5 is similar, it is not a direct request for teaching but encouragement.

7 In Luke 1:20 the impediment is said to be from God; in Mark 7:32 no cause is stated, but Mark 9:17 links demonic activity with the lack of speech. On Jewish thinking about the association of disease or disability and demons, see SB 4:501–35; Van Der Loos 1965: 351–53; Ernst 1977: 373.

12 Nolland 1993a: 637 adds other signs like turning back the sun (2 Kings 20:8–11) or providing manna like Moses (cf. Luke 9:12–17). SB 1:726–27 discusses this category in later rabbinic writings.

15 SB 1:635 cites Derek› ereṣ Zuṭṭa 5 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 251): "A house in which there is disunity will assuredly be destroyed at the last."

4 In b. Giṭ. 52a, Satan says of Rabbi Meir's work of reconciling two men, "Woe is me; he has driven me out of my house"; cited in SB 1:217. See b. Ḥul. 105b on the "demon of the poor."

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25

(i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

9 Grundmann 1963: 242 argues that Jonah was seen as a sign in Judaism because of his miraculous deliverance from the whale; see SB 1:642–49. But these Jewish references are late, as Fitzmyer 1985: 935–36 notes, adding that Josephus's account of Jonah (Antiquities 9.10.2 §§208–14) makes nothing of the fish episode.

16 On ἁπλοῦς as "clear, pure, healthy," see BAGD 86 and BAA 171. When the eye is clear, it is healthy and takes in light. The eye is a figure for spiritual condition in Matt. 6:22; Prov. 4:18–19; 11:25 (ἁπλοῦς with a different sense); T. Iss. 3.4; 4.6; Bauernfeind, TDNT 1:386; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377; Harder, TDNT 6:556; SB 1:302, 431–32, 722, 833.

14 Ps. 14:1; 53:1 [53:2 MT]; 92:6 [92:7 MT]; 94:8; Prov. 6:12; Luke 12:20; Rom. 2:20; 1 Cor. 15:36; 2 Cor. 11:16, 19; 12:6, 11; SB 1:280; 2:102 (discusses Jewish warnings about having an arrogant heart, with Deut. 8:11–14 being the key text); Schweizer 1984: 199; Plummer 1896: 310; Bertram, TDNT 9:230–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 947. On the OT background, see Donald 1963.

4 On leaven as an evil disposition in Judaism, see SB 1:728–29; Windisch, TDNT 2:905–6; Manson 1949: 270.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see

BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to “acts of mercy”; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, “My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures.” The object of the last clause is not clear (“for heaven,” “of benefits,” “of souls,” or “for myself in the world to come”), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning “to mix.” The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression “Palestinian.”

9 On the building of aqueducts to improve the city’s water supply, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.2 §60; Jewish War 2.9.4 §175; SB 2:197; Klostermann 1929: 143.

13 Deut. 22:9; Judg. 9:7–15; 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; 2 Kings 18:31; SB 1:872–73 §g; Marshall 1978: 555. On fig trees and vineyards, see Pliny, Natural History 17.35 §200 and Nolland 1993a: 718. Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum 3.10.6, advises against mixing figs and vines.

6 Jesus' introduction of the parable compares with rabbinic introductions of similar material; SB 2:7–9; note also Isa. 40:18; Marshall 1978: 561; Hauck, TDNT 5:753–54.

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ›Abot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

15 In ancient Judaism, Ps. 118 was seen as messianic; SB 1:849–50, 876; m. Suk. 3.9; Midr. Ps. 118.19–20 on 118:21–22 (= Braude 1959: 2.243–44); Jeremias 1966: 256–57.

4 Plummer 1896: 356 notes that two to four people could recline on a couch. SB 4:617–20 cites the variety of customs and notes another configuration with the host at the head of the table.

9 Prov. 25:6–7 (NRSV) says, "Do not put yourself forward in the king's presence / or stand in the place of the great; / for it is better to be told, 'Come up here,' / than to be put lower in the presence of a noble." For Jewish parallels, see Sir. 3:17–20; 4:8; 12:11; 29:5; Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (fifth century); ʾ*Abot de Rabbi Nathan* A.25 (= Goldin 1955: 110); Bultmann 1963: 104; Fitzmyer 1985: 1047; SB 1:916.

12 Some see a problem in the shepherd's leaving behind the ninety-nine, but this is probably a detail omitted in the abbreviated telling of the story. Ἔρημος is an open field, a heath, where the animals grazed; Manson 1949: 283; 1 Sam. 17:28. On the use of the numbers ninety-nine and one, see SB 1:784–85; m. Peʾa 4.1–2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1076.

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

20 The phrase in heaven parallels the idiom before the angels in 15:10 (SB 2:209). Both expressions are used to avoid direct mention of God.

24 SB 2:212 narrates a similar Jewish parable from a later period in Song Rab. 1.1.9 on 1:1, where the subject is seeking wisdom like silver, a reference to the Torah.

14 Ἀγρός refers to fields associated with a farm where animals graze; BAGD 14 §3; BAA 24 §3. Βόσκω means "to tend animals"; Matt. 8:33 = Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; BAGD 145; BAA 289. SB 1:492–93 cites several Jewish texts that condemn or forbid Jews to raise swine, including b. B.

Qam. 82b: “Cursed is the man who raises swine, and cursed is the man who teaches his son Greek philosophy.”

18 To speak of sinning before heaven is to acknowledge that one has sinned against God; SB 2:217. OT conceptual or idiomatic parallels are found in Exod. 10:16; 1 Sam. 7:6; 20:1; Tob. 3:3; Jdt. 5:17; Sus. 23; Plummer 1896: 374; Manson 1949: 288; Lohfink 1975. Jer. 31:18–20 shows the proper attitude of repentance. In Hos. 2:7 [2:9 MT], Israel returns to her first husband.

8 In t. Menaḥ. 13.22 (= Neusner 1977–86: 5.162), the leadership’s love of money and hatred of one another is why the temple came to be destroyed; also SB 1:937; 2:222; 4:336–39; Jeremias 1969: 49, 114. Luce 1933: 264 objects to this description, but fails to interact with the ancient sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 245 is right that a story about the afterlife would hardly be a meaningful rebuke to the Sadducees.

24 Marshall notes that Jesus’ reference to not marrying a divorced person goes beyond what Judaism allowed; SB 1:320–21.

11 For discussion of the name Lazarus, see Dunkerley 1958–59; Derrett 1970: 78–99; Cave 1968–69; B. Scott 1989: 149 n. 28; SB 2:223; Meier 1994: 825, 868 n. 158.

12 This view sees the name as introduced into the story later, but it is hard to substantiate such interpolations. SB 2:223 traces the name’s usage and popularity. Fitzmyer 1985: 1131 notes that the name exists on numerous ossuaries, so it is clearly very common.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978:

636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

18 1 Enoch 22.10–11 speaks of a place for the dead who have sinned and yet have received a proper interment; SB 2:227. Not unlike Jesus' warning, 1 Enoch 103.5–8 delivers a stinging indictment of wealthy Sadducees who live extravagantly only to descend to Sheol.

33 On the phrase "Moses and the prophets," see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

5 Though not accepting this view, Schweizer 1984: 272 notes a rabbinic tradition that if two Sabbaths were perfectly observed the kingdom would come, citing Isa. 56:4–7; b. Šab. 118b; SB 1:600 §B. Against this view is the late tractate Derek ʾereṣ Rabbah 11.13 (= A. Cohen 1965: 2.565), which cites Rabbi Jose as saying, "Whoever calculates the end has no portion in the future world." This fits the later rabbis' tendency to discourage apocalyptic speculation.

8 In everyday Greek, παρατήρησις was used of the symptoms or signs of disease. To make such calculations, Judaism played off chronological imagery in Ps. 90:4 (seven thousand years); Jer. 25:11; 29:10 (seventy exile weeks); Dan. 9:2 (seventy year-weeks), although Ernst 1977: 486 notes that not all rabbinic Jews accepted such speculation (for which, see SB 4:977–1015 and n. 5 above).

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

4 So the aorist passive participle σταθείς (as he stood); BAGD 382 §II.1b; BAA 775 §II.1b. The circumstantial aorist passive participle of ἵστημι is found in the NT only in Luke's writings: Luke 18:40; 19:8; Acts 2:14; 5:20; 11:13; 17:22; 25:18; 27:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1186. In the Jewish world, it was not unusual to stand and pray (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:14, 22; Plummer 1896: 416; SB 1:401–2; 2:240; Marshall 1978: 679).

13 Later Judaism used a similar saying about an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to refer to an impossible dream or an illogical argument; Lachs 1987: 331–32; b. Ber. 55b; b. B. Mes\;. 38b; SB 1:828; Marshall 1978: 687.

3 Most of the passages from the Talmud and Genesis Rabbah listed in SB 1:842–44 are late (from the fourth century a.d. at the earliest). No messianic use of Zech. 9:9 is found in the Pseudepigrapha.

16 In Gen. 4:10 Abel's spilled blood cries out, and esp. in Hab. 2:11 Jerusalem's stones cry out against Israel's injustice and sin. Marshall 1978: 716 notes the possibility that creation will speak out against the sin of the Pharisees (Jeremias, TDNT 4:270), an option that is less satisfying contextually than the standard OT use of the image; so correctly SB 2:253, which notes the use of this figure in Judaism: Tg. Hab. 2:11; Midr. Ps. 73.4 on 73:10 (= Braude 1959: 2.4).

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

10 For the contrast between judgment of the righteous and the sinner, see Prov. 11:31; 1 Pet. 4:17–18; SB 2:263; Gen. Rab. 65.22 on 27:27.

8 1 Chron. 15:24; 2 Chron. 35:8; Neh. 11:12; Fitzmyer 1981: 322; Leaney 1958: 79; Creed 1930: 8. ABD 6:1057–61 records thirty-one individuals with the name Zechariah in the OT and Judaism, four of whom are also mentioned by Josephus (who knows of two more); Schalit 1968: 49.

1 Marshall 1978: 491–93 sees different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 96 sees most of Matt. 23 coming from a special Matthean source. Ellis 1974: 170 and Schlatter 1960: 303–5 see a combination of Q and special Lucan material. But Wiefel 1988: 227 objects to this because of the material's similarity to Matt. 23.

4 F. E. D. Schleiermacher also held this view. On the history of interpretation, see Thiessen 1934; Weinert 1977: 505; and Zerwick 1959.

21 Schlier, TDNT 1:639–40. God's arm is also an image for the second exodus (Ezek. 20:33–34; Isa. 51:5, 9; 53:1); Nolland 1989: 71.

40 Schlier, TDNT 1:352–53; Schürmann 1969: 92; BDB 855. When a plant is the image in the OT, a Davidite is in view; Nolland 1989: 90.

40 1 Macc. 11:43; 1 Enoch 5.4; BAGD 126–27; BAA 254; Schlier, TDNT 1:513. Braun, TDNT 6:252, says that ἀφίστημι means apostasy.

15 Egelkraut 1976: 143, esp. n. 1; Miyoshi 1974: 59–61. For example, μετὰ ταῦτα occurs nine times in Luke–Acts, but not at all in Matthew and Mark (unless one counts the textually uncertain Mark 16:12). The use of ὁ κύριος (the Lord) in narrative introductions is Lucan; see the exegesis of Luke 2:11. The verb ἀναδείκνυμι (to appoint) appears only here and in Acts 1:24; Schlier, TDNT 2:30.

7 Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον means "that which falls to me"; Tob. 3:17; 6:12; P. Oxy. vol. 4 #715 lines 13–15; Creed 1930: 198; Hauck, TDNT 1:529; MM 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 1087. As a noun, οὐσίας refers to property; Tob. 14:13; 3 Macc. 3:28; Josephus, Antiquities 7.5.5 §114. On διεῖλεν (he divided), see Schlier, TDNT 1:184.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that "in your midst" is not possible. Schlosser 1980: 1.202–4 argues that "in one's power" is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for “in the midst of.” His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 436. Bovon 1989: 154 prefers to speak only of a biographical interest, calling the account an anecdote. He compares it to the Infancy Story of Thomas 2, an account of a five-year-old Jesus fashioning twelve sparrows from clay. Though this account is much more fanciful than the Lucan pericope, its ending (19), stressing Jesus’ wisdom, is similar to but less restrained than Luke’s emphasis on wisdom (Schmahl 1974; see the exegesis of 2:46). In this case, the Infancy Gospel of Thomas is influenced by Luke (R. Brown 1977: 481).

35 Fitzmyer 1981: 300; Creed 1930: 5; Marshall 1978: 44. K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:506, cites the Lucan usage noted above. In the LXX, ἀσφάλεια normally refers to something that is safe or secure (2 Macc. 3:22), as it does in Acts 5:23. Its use in Luke with a verb of knowing points to a psychological goal. It refers to knowing the truth, but doing so securely.

29 BDF §177, §233.2; BDR §177.1–2; Marshall 1978: 68; Klostermann 1929: 14. Luke 1:33 is the only use of the verb in the Gospels with reference to Jesus; K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:590. References to his “kingdom” are found in 22:30 and 23:42. Despite the absence of this term, regal reign imagery is found in several other terms and concepts, especially in Luke’s use of Ps. 110:1 in Luke–Acts, as well as in the picture of Jesus’ victory over Satan. In the OT, 2 Sam. 2:4 comes closest to this wording; Nolland 1989: 52.

8 Συγκαλέω (to call together) occurs elsewhere in Mark 15:16; Luke 15:6, 9; Acts 5:21; elsewhere in the middle voice at Luke 23:13; Acts

10:24; 28:17; K. Schmidt, TDNT 3:496.

10 On the various ways to express the idea of preaching the kingdom, see K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:583 §3b, who notes that these expressions are most plentiful in Luke–Acts.

8 Fitzmyer 1981: 825–26 mentions the tension between matter and form in the travel account, citing K. Schmidt's remark that "though Jesus is always traveling to Jerusalem, he never makes any real progress on this journey."

28 For the variety of ways the kingdom is said to come, see K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:584.

11 The Semitic rhetorical idiom "not x … but y" means "not so much x … but y" (also 10:20). On this use of φωνέω (to call), see O. Betz, TDNT 9:303. On ἀντικαλέω (to invite back), a NT hapax legomenon, see K. Schmidt, TDNT 3:496.

15 On the various expressions used to say that the kingdom is near or present, see K. Schmidt, TDNT 1:584. Fitzer, TDNT 9:89 n. 10, sees the expression here as synonymous to that of 10:9. Note especially how the preaching of the kingdom and the gospel are linked in 9:1–6, while the kingdom and Jesus' activity are associated in 11:20. Luke 7:18–23 (esp. 7:22); 7:28; 11:20; and 16:16 seem to place the initial phase of fulfillment in the present.

25 For other figurative uses, see Ps. 39:3 [39:4 MT]; 73:21; T. Naph. 7.4; K. Schmidt, TDNT 3:464. For literal uses of καίω, see Matt. 5:15; 13:40; Luke 12:35; John 5:35; 15:6; Heb. 12:18; Rev. 4:5; 8:8, 10; 19:20; 21:8.

34 On this topic in the Synoptics, see T. Schmidt 1987. In arguing against making too much of the criticism, Schmidt is correct, but his book perhaps overreacts in the other direction. More balanced is Pilgrim 1981.

35 Marshall 1978: 258, however, sees a shift of audience from outsiders to insiders in this verse; so also Ernst 1977: 224. But see T. Schmidt 1987: 141.

20 Σκηνή is the OT term used for "booths" and alludes to the picture of blessing that was tied to celebrating the exodus; Lev. 23:34. See also Mark 9:5; Rev. 7:15; 21:3; 1 Enoch 39.4; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 2:11. On the eschatological use of σκηνή (booths or habitations), see Michaelis, TDNT 7:378–79. T. Schmidt 1987: 154–55 argues that the passage refers neither to alms nor to the generous use of money, but to a prudent person acting in a "critical impermanent situation with that which has been entrusted to him in order to gain lasting benefits." This may be the broad application if one had just this one verse, but the Lucan context suggests that using money generously is a central concern.

2 L. Johnson 1977: 141–43 notes the link between this text and 16:14–18 concerning the dispute over generosity and the law's value. So also T. Schmidt 1987: 155–57 speaks of 16:14–31 as a unit to make the point about this connection. He calls this warning to the godless rich a "polemical blow to opponents [and an] ethical sting to" Luke's readers. The parable is eventually a parable of rejection, and thus a parable of warning.

27 Majestic rule is suggested by the term throne; Schmitz, TDNT 3:164 §B2.

16 Grundmann, TDNT 2:58. Schmitz, TDNT 5:798, argues that the phrase is Palestinian.

12 As usual for Luke's Gospel (four of seven occurrences), παρεκάλει is imperfect: "he was beseeching [him]." On such requests, see Matt. 8:5; 14:36 = Mark 6:56; Matt. 26:53; Mark 1:40; 5:18; 7:32; 8:22; Luke 7:4; Schmitz, TDNT 5:794 §F1.

11 Gospel of the Ebionites in Epiphanius, Panarion 30.13.7–8; Gospel of the Hebrews in Jerome, Commentary on Isaiah §4 (on Isa. 11:2); Gospel of the Nazareans in Jerome, Against the Pelagians 3.2; Funk 1985: 1.316; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.169, 177, 160.

2 Plummer 1896: 233 cites the Acts of Pilate (= Gospel of Nicodemus) 1.7 as the first text to name her Bernice (= Latin Veronica); Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.511. This apocryphal work is available in a fifth-century edition, though its roots may reach back to the second century.

5 Herod the Great was said to have suffered from dropsy; Josephus, Antiquities 17.6.5 §§168–70. In the apocryphal Acts of Paul 4, Paul heals a man of this condition; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 2.247.

23 Church tradition holds that Peter was crucified upside down (Acts of Peter 37–38 [Schneemelcher 1991–92: 2.315]), though this probably had not happened at the time of Luke's writing.

11 Filling in details of this story became popular in some circles. In the Old Latin, these two bandits are variously named Ioathas and Maggatras (Luke 23:32), Zoathan and Chammatha (Mark 15:27), or Zoathan and Camma (Matt. 27:38) (Plummer 1896: 530), while the Acts of Pilate 9 records their names as Dysmas and Gestas (Schneemelcher 1991–92:

1.512). Still other traditions speak of Jesus falling, meeting Mary, and speaking with a women named Veronica (called Bernice in Acts of Pilate 8), who testified before Pilate because Jesus had healed her issue of blood (cf. Luke 8:43–48). See also the Arabic Infancy Gospel 23 (R. Brown 1994: 969; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.460).

21 In some church tradition, the confessing criminal's name is given as Dismas or Dysmas; Acts of Pilate 10.2 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512); Fitzmyer 1985: 1509. See n. 11.

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

4 The Gospel of Peter 9.35–10.42 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.224–25) gives details about the resurrection, an expansion that demonstrates the differences between canonical and noncanonical accounts and indicates what happened to the tradition in the postapostolic period; cf. also Barn. 15.9. The glorified body is not a mere return to the former earthly existence (i.e., like the resurrection of Lazarus), but represents a transcendent form of real existence (1 Cor. 15:35–49, esp. 15:42–44). On the resurrection as event, see Stein 1977 and Craig 1980.

5 On ὄρθρος (dawn), see BAGD 580; BAA 1176; elsewhere in the NT at John 8:2 and Acts 5:21; cf. Gospel of Peter 12.50 (= Schneemelcher 1991– 92: 1.225); T. Jos. 8.1; 1 Enoch 100.2. On βαθύς (deep), see BAGD 130 §2; BAA 263 §2; elsewhere in the NT at John 4:11; Acts 20:9; Rev. 2:24.

31 Evaluation and rejection of views 4–7 can be found in Schneider 1977b. To determine the difference between views 4 and 7 is hard, except view 4 says the account is full, while view 7 might suggest it is exhaustive. Dillon 1981: 218–23 agrees with Schneider (view 3 above) and argues that view 5 is incorporated into it.

1 There are various ways to list the parallels. With only minor variations, I follow Schürmann's list (1969: 59 n. 132). For other arrangements and discussions, see Tiede 1988: 45–47; R. Brown 1977: 293–98; Schneider 1977a: 48; and Creed 1930: 13.

5 The arguments here are complex, based on a variety of suppositions, and thus come in a variety of forms. Schürmann 1969: 56–57; Bovon 1989: 64–70; and Schneider 1977a: 48–49 have brief discussions of the details, as does Marshall 1978: 63. Most discussions center on 1:34, so more detail awaits treatment of that verse. Other details related to the discussion are treated as they arise in the verses.

12 So Schneider 1977a: 49. Against a reference to Isaiah in Luke are R. Brown 1977: 300 and Fitzmyer 1981: 336. The NT sees the virgin state as honorable (Acts 21:9; 1 Cor. 7:25; Rev. 4:14); Bovon 1989: 72.

22 For this allusion, see Marshall 1978: 66; Leaney 1958: 83; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 46, esp. n. 40; uncertain of it is R. Brown 1977: 299–300; Laurentin 1967: 115.

37 Creed 1930: 19; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 49–50; Fitzmyer 1981: 348–50; Wiefel 1988: 51–52; Ernst 1977: 72; R. Brown

1977: 309. Gewiess, in an appendix to Laurentin's German 1967 edition, interestingly takes a view opposite of Laurentin in the French original and omits Laurentin's own discussion of the question.

3 R. Brown 1977: 346–55; Wiefel 1988: 57; Farris 1985: 86–98; Fitzmyer 1981: 359–62; Jones 1968; Bemile 1986: 36. Fitzmyer, agreeing with Winter and Schneider, notes that the hymn is parallel to the psalms in 1 Maccabees, the Qumran Thanksgiving hymns, and the Qumran War Scroll. The hymn also resembles the OT hymns of praise (Ps. 33, 47, 48, 113, 135, 136; one could add to the list 1 Sam. 2:1–10; Jon. 2:2–9 [2:3–10 MT]; Isa. 38:9–20; Tob. 8:15–17; and Sir. 51:1–12). Fitzmyer (p. 359) regards 1:48 as a Lucan insert. In fact, he seems favorable to R. Brown's position that the hymn emerged out of the Jewish-Christian community. Schneider 1977a: 56 sees a Hellenistic Jewish-Christian rewrite of Jewish material or a reworking by Luke himself; so also C. F. Evans 1990: 171–73.

10 Farris 1985: 67–85 surveys the parallel examples in the OT and Judaism; Berger 1984: 242–43; Fitzmyer 1981: 359; Schneider 1977a: 56–58. Bovon 1989: 82–83 notes that the Magnificat focuses on the victory of the righteous; it does not praise God as Creator, as do the Qumranic hymns, and has less harsh criticism of enemies than do the Psalms of Solomon. Bovon notes many verbal parallels to the Psalms of Solomon:

Motif	Magnificat	Psalms of Solomon
fearing God	1:50	2.33; 3.12; 4.23; 15.13
Israel or the nation as	1:54	12.6; 17.21

servant
Abraham and his descendants	1:55	9.9; 18.3
the proud	1:51	2.1–31; 17.13, 23
contrast of rich and poor	1:53	5.11
reversal	1:52	11.4
refrain	1:50	13.12
power of God	1:51	17.3
arm of God	1:51	13.2
God’s seeing	1:48	18.2
God’s help	1:54	16.3, 5
God’s remembering	1:54	10.1, 4
God’s speaking	1:55	11.7

35 Hendriksen 1978: 172–73; Schneider 1977a: 72. The omission of the term ἕως in D and the Itala shows some ancient manuscripts had this view too. But the omission is not attested widely enough to be taken seriously as original.

1 The view is old. Those who hold it include Bultmann 1963: 300; Creed 1930: 44; Klostermann 1929: 45; Schürmann 1969: 139; Schneider 1977a: 76; Wiefel 1988: 82; and Fitzmyer 1981: 435–36. About the only one who raises doubts is Marshall 1978: 126. Despite the remarks about sources, Coleridge 1993: 187–213 is certainly correct that from a narrative viewpoint this pericope could not be dropped without substantial loss to the infancy narrative. Jesus' remarks about himself are a fitting climax to the prologue. In Coleridge's words (p. 189), this unit is "the most important" of the infancy narrative.

2 For characteristic approaches to this issue, often appealing to Q, see Klostermann 1929: 50; Creed 1930: 46–48; Schneider 1977a: 82. Bovon 1989: 165–66 speaks of Q, Mark, and other material. Distinctive is Goulder 1989: 271–72, who argues for Luke's use of Matthew.

4 Schürmann 1969: 218; so also Schneider 1977a: 99; C. F. Evans 1990: 256 (who incorrectly calls this the majority view); and Manson 1949: 42–43 (but with no details other than the claim that Matthew's order makes "a fine dramatic climax" so it is hard to imagine Luke's altering it if it were the original).

8 Bultmann 1963: 31–32 (where he calls the account an apophthegm or pronouncement story, which he believes grew into this full-blown account); Creed 1930: 65; Schneider 1977a: 106–7; Klostermann 1929: 62; Fitzmyer 1981: 527; Tannehill 1972; C. F. Evans 1990: 266–67 (who notes a series of Lucan expressions in the account); Goulder 1989: 299. For a summary of the recent discussion and a full bibliography on this passage, see Schreck 1989, while Corrington 1993 evaluates a redactional reading of this text with other types of readings.

30 Plummer 1896: 138; Schneider 1977a: 116; Fitzmyer 1981: 553. Against this argument is Farmer 1964: 128–30, who sees Mark combining both Matthew and Luke; but see Fitzmyer 1972.

6 So hold most scholars. For discussion, see Schneider 1977a: 122–23; Marshall 1978: 199; Fitzmyer 1981: 561 (who speaks of L, where the postresurrection tradition was already moved back; Luke simply used L and joined it to Marcan material); Ernst 1977: 184–85 (who goes on to say that Luke is not merely embellishing Mark); Van Der Loos 1965: 670; Schramm 1971: 37–40 (who sees mostly Marcan material); Dietrich 1972: 25–38 (who explains why Mark alone cannot be the source).

15 So Fitzmyer 1981: 573 and Wiefel 1988: 116 rightly, against Conzelmann 1960: 43 and Schneider 1977a: 130, who see a reference to Judea, no doubt because of 4:44. Of course, if Judea is broadly understood in that verse, then Galilee is included in that earlier reference as well. See the exegesis of 4:44.

2 Bovon 1989: 346 n. 5 notes that among many Protestant scholars this has been the major position for some time and that only recently have

Catholic commentaries like those of Schürmann, Schneider, and Fitzmyer come to accept this approach.

32 Van Der Loos 1965: 572 cites OT precedent (Judg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 30:12); more correct is Schneider 1977a: 199. In Judaism, see 1 Enoch 22.1–14; 39.4–8. Nolland 1989: 422 notes a possible contact with 1 Kings 17:21–22.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

3 Schramm 1971: 139–40 also sees another source. Matthean prioritists see Luke working with Matthew and must speak of Marcan expansion. Schneider 1977a: 218 is against another source, but Nolland 1993a: 506 regards it as possible. Nolland (pp. 506–8) also details the scholarly treatment of the parallel in Mark.

4 On the possibility that Luke is from Antioch of Syria, a tradition that Jerome mentions in the prologue of his commentary on Matthew, see Hoehner 1972: 231–32 n. 9; Strobel 1958a; and the introduction to the Gospel of Luke abve, under “Origin and Purpose—Authorship—External Evidence.” Schneider 1977a: 83 and Hoehner 1977: 34 do not agree on the month in view in 27: Schneider has Oct. 1 and Hoehner has Sept. 21.

7 Resseguie 1975 puts five of fourteen possible interpretations in this category. C. F. Evans 1990: 433 points out the lack of chronological notes, especially at the end of the section. Vague indications of time and place are provided only in the beginning of the section: 9:52, 56–57; 10:1, 21, 38; 11:14, 27; 13:10, 31; 14:1, 25. Schürmann 1994: 1 speaks of a metaphorical journey account in which Jesus goes his way to Jerusalem as an itinerant prophetic teacher who divides Israel. On Luke’s use of journey and way terminology, see Schneider 1977a: 227.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses’ addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 (“leans” this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99;

Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus’ intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark’s account and does not testify to a separate event.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

1 Most argue for Q: Fitzmyer 1985: 953 (12:1 from L), 956 (12:2–9 from Q), 962–63 (12:10 from Q or Mark; 12:11–12 from Q); Ernst 1977: 392 (for 12:2–9); and Schneider 1977a: 277. Grundmann 1963: 252 says it is "probably" Q. Marshall 1978: 510 speaks of Q material conflated with Marcan elements and also argues that Q has various recensions and that Luke's version is slightly different from that of Matthew. Nolland 1993a: 675–76 sees Q for 12:2–9 and a mixture of Q and Mark for 12:10–12.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

25 Note the possible views mentioned in the exegesis of 12:41. The Matthean parallel of the hypocrite is enlightening, since a "play-actor" is addressed by ὑποκριτής; BAGD 845; BAA 1684. The term may well be Matthew's rendering, since he uses it seven times uniquely (Schneider 1975: 26 n. 14; Nolland 1993a: 704). Marshall 1978: 544 notes that Aramaic הנפא (hnp,) can be translated with the sense that appears in each version of the account. On false teachers, see esp. 2 Pet. 2:1–2, 13–14, 17–22.

3 For the presence of these verses in Q are Schneider 1977a: 324–25 and Wiefel 1988: 282. Fitzmyer 1985: 1073 sees 15:4–6 in Q and 15:8–9 in L. Other parallels are found in the Gospel of Thomas 107 and the Gnostic Gospel of Truth 31.35–32.9.

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

13 Προστίθημι (to add) is also Lucan, appearing thirteen times in Luke–Acts and only three times in the other Gospels; Schneider 1977a: 347; Isa. 26:15. As Fitzmyer 1985: 1143 notes, the apostles would already have had some faith, so the idea is to add faith (against BAGD 719 §2; BAA 1440 §2).

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

43 This is the point of the connection to Luke 1:77; Godet 1875: 1.117. On the verse as a whole, see Danker 1988: 50–51. C. Schneider, TDNT 3:443, argues that the image is a figure for mourning. Those who sit in darkness are those who mourn the presence of death. Whether this particular picture is present is less likely given the OT background.

22 In the NT this figure is usually found in allusions to Ps. 110: Eph. 1:19–23; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; C. Schneider, TDNT 3:442.

28 Schneider argues that the ripping of the outer curtain would have had no significance, but the ripping of any temple curtain would surely be important. Regardless of the location, it suggests an opening up of access to God.

18 Lev. 20:20–21; Jer. 22:30; 1 Sam. 1:5–6; 2 Sam. 6:23; Plummer 1896: 10; Fitzmyer 1981: 323; J. Schneider, TDNT 5:239. Contrast Gen. 1:28; Ps. 127, 128.

20 On the idiom of heaven and earth passing away, see Matt. 5:18; 24:35 = Mark 13:31 = Luke 21:33; J. Schneider, TDNT 2:682.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

21 Note the continued use of ἀπαγγέλλω (to report; 8:34, 36, 47); Schniewind, TDNT 1:66 §B. Only in Luke does the woman mention that she touched him.

8 The term διάγγελλε is a present imperative. On its meaning "to proclaim far and wide," see BAGD 182; BAA 364; elsewhere only in Acts 21:26 and Rom. 9:17. Schniewind, TDNT 1:68, speaks of proclaiming God's eschatological lordship, that is, his sovereignty over humans in rule and in time.

3 For effective refutation, see O'Rourke 1971–72 and Jeremias 1971b. Marshall 1978: 605 rejects attempts to posit a Lucan origin for the parable, such as Schottroff 1971 defends. Goulder 1989: 614–16 argues for Lucan authorship of the parable, attempting to refute the various cases made for authenticity on linguistic grounds by Jeremias, O'Rourke, or Hofius 1977–78. Goulder (pp. 611–12) argues that Luke is relying consciously or unconsciously on the story of Joseph in Genesis, but the cause of the "lostness" of the son in the Joseph cycle of Gen. 39–50 and of the prodigal could not be more different. Nolland 1993a: 780–81 correctly rejects attempts to split the parable in two.

17 Schrage, TDNT 7:810–26, 828–33; Schürer 1973–87: 2.423–63, esp. 447–54; Safrai 1976c: 927–33; Billerbeck 1964.

31 Maurer, TDNT 8:161; Schrage, TDNT 8:288 n. 129; Lohse, TDNT 9:431–32 §C4. In the Marcan examples, this is often requested of Jesus; Nolland 1989: 213.

40 Jesus often heals at synagogues: Mark 1:23–27 = Luke 4:33–36; Mark 1:39 = Matt. 4:23; Mark 3:1–5 = Matt. 12:9–13 = Luke 6:6–10; Matt. 9:35; Luke 13:10–17; Schrage, TDNT 7:830 n. 210.

8 Schrage, TDNT 7:813–14, 818 n. 123, remarks that such an attitude usually produced a gift to a synagogue. Luke 7 is unique in speaking of the synagogue itself as the gift. Schrage thinks it is a small synagogue.

15 The synagogue is seen negatively in Matt. 23:34; 10:17 = Mark 13:9 = Luke 21:12; Schrage, TDNT 7:834. The political leaders in view are largely Gentile: Luke 20:20; 21:12; Acts 4:26–30.

12 On the synagogue leader (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), see Schrage, TDNT 7:847. This person was responsible for the order and progress of worship, so he is the right one to speak. The most learned member presents the official view on Jesus' act. There is no need to argue for a redactional seam at the shift of address to the audience. The leader is responsible for the assembly's worship (Nolland 1993a: 724). Nolland argues that "the directive fits only imperfectly in the flow of the story." I disagree: practice and custom is the issue here. The issue cannot arise until Jesus heals.

10 Schramm 1971: 37 n. 2 shows that the word order and word choice in Mark 6:4a are not close to Luke 4:24. Note especially Mark's use of ἄτιμος in contrast to Luke's δεκτός, which is the key term in the verse. However, Luke's term may be influenced by Luke 4:19.

11 Schramm 1971: 37; Marshall 1978: 179. Ernst 1977: 168–69 sees Luke's hand in many but not all changes. Bovon 1989: 207–8 sees an additional source beyond Mark, either Q or special Lucan material, and despairs of being able to sort out what came from where, beyond the basic elements in 4:18–22 and 4:25–27 originating in the additional source. Crossan 1991 fails to discuss this text, a significant omission in a life-of-Jesus study. This omission may well suggest that Crossan regards none of it as going back to Jesus.

4 Aland 1985: §36. For the list of differences, see Fitzmyer 1981: 542; Schramm 1971: 85–88.

27 Παραχρῆμα occurs sixteen times in Luke–Acts and elsewhere in the NT only twice at Matt. 21:19–20; Plummer 1896: 157; Creed 1930: 71. Ἐφίστημι appears eighteen times in Luke–Acts and not at all in Mark or Matthew; Schramm 1971: 88.

28 Luke never uses ὄψιος, which is found in Mark's account five times and in Matthew's seven times, including the parallels in Mark 1:32 and Matt. 8:16; Schramm 1971: 88.

32 On ἕκαστος, see BAGD 236; BAA 476. Εἷς(μία/ἕν) ἕκαστος is used in Luke–Acts eight times (of which six are in Acts); Matthew once; and Mark not at all; Schramm 1971: 88.

6 So hold most scholars. For discussion, see Schneider 1977a: 122–23; Marshall 1978: 199; Fitzmyer 1981: 561 (who speaks of L, where the postresurrection tradition was already moved back; Luke simply used L and joined it to Marcan material); Ernst 1977: 184–85 (who goes on to say that Luke is not merely embellishing Mark); Van Der Loos 1965: 670; Schramm 1971: 37–40 (who sees mostly Marcan material); Dietrich 1972: 25–38 (who explains why Mark alone cannot be the source).

8 Only Schramm 1971: 91–99 suggests that Luke used a written source.

11 All we may have here is a Lucan stylistic introduction. In 5:12, Luke uses an equally ambiguous phrase: “one of the cities.” Schramm 1971: 125 raises the possibility of another version of the tradition. It is possible, but not necessary.

6 That Matthew may have accompanied Jesus lends credence to the added detail of the second demoniac. The extent of the agreement between Mark and Luke leads most to see Mark as the source for Luke; so Schürmann 1969: 487; Schramm 1971: 90; Marshall 1978: 335; Fitzmyer 1981: 733; Wiefel 1988: 165–66. Bovon 1989: 432 is so impressed with these agreements that he argues that this account stands against the two-Gospel (or Griesbach) hypothesis. What could have caused Luke to go his own way against Matthew?

21 Even Schramm 1971: 126 does not posit a distinct source here, though often he does. Some of these differences make one wonder if an oral source is not also behind Luke.

5 Bovon 1989: 443 and n. 4 acknowledges the possibility of oral sources, especially for 8:44. Schramm 1971: 127 notes that 8:42 with its use of ὑπάγειν (to go) and the direct speech of 8:46 are not Lucan and could be from an oral source.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 757 notes six Lucan modifications of Mark: (1) the Lucan use of the title τετραάρχης (tetrarch) (as in 3:1) versus the title βασιλεύς (king); (2) a reference to τὰ γινόμενα πάντα (all that has happened) instead of just to miracles; (3) a unique reference to Herod’s perplexity; (4) the use of threefold ὅτι for the reports of popular speculation about Jesus; (5) the “who is this?” question; and (6) the note about a desire to see Jesus. Most see no sources here outside of Mark; Schürmann 1969: 508; Bovon 1989: 461–62; Schramm 1971: 128.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

3 Schramm 1971: 139–40 also sees another source. Matthean prioritists see Luke working with Matthew and must speak of Marcan expansion. Schneider 1977a: 218 is against another source, but Nolland 1993a: 506 regards it as possible. Nolland (pp. 506–8) also details the scholarly treatment of the parallel in Mark.

1 Marshall distinguishes these oral sources from the presence of another written source, which is Schramm's view; 1971: 130–31.

21 Fitzmyer 1985: 1337 is against a source. Creed 1930: 255 and Leaney 1958: 260 say Luke inserted the phrase because he was detailing what was sketched in previous verses. Marshall 1978: 764–65 speaks of the great puzzlement that this addition has caused and mentions the possible influence of another source (also Schramm 1971: 174–75). Perhaps this one source had the two eschatological discourses that Luke reflects. But what caused the difference? Did Luke or his source supply a clarifying stylistic break? Either option is possible.

8 Bultmann 1963: 31–32 (where he calls the account an apophthegm or pronouncement story, which he believes grew into this full-blown account); Creed 1930: 65; Schneider 1977a: 106–7; Klostermann 1929: 62; Fitzmyer 1981: 527; Tannehill 1972; C. F. Evans 1990: 266–67 (who notes a series of Lucan expressions in the account); Goulder 1989: 299. For a summary of the recent discussion and a full bibliography on this passage, see Schreck 1989, while Corrington 1993 evaluates a redactional reading of this text with other types of readings.

10 For details, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.246–50, 287; Wiefel 1988: 47; Schrenk, TDNT 3:262; and esp. Jeremias 1969: 199.

14 Marshall 1978: 52; Schrenk, TDNT 2:189 §C2c (who notes Lucan parallels to the expression in Luke 2:25 and Acts 10:22). In addition, Schrenk notes NT parallels: Abel in Matt. 23:35; Lot in 2 Pet. 2:7–8; prophets in Matt. 13:17; 23:29; and martyrs in Matt. 23:35. The phrase has parallels in the OT (Deut. 6:25; 24:13; Ps. 106:31) and Judaism (Sus. 3; Sir. 44:17); Nolland 1989: 26.

16 Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:26; Num. 36:13; Deut. 4:40; 10:13; 27:10; 2 Kings 17:13. In Judaism: 1 Macc. 2:21; T. Levi 14.4; T. Judah 13.1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:220; Klostermann 1929: 6; Plummer 1896: 9 (who notes that the terms are synonymous in this usage).

21 This is the one NT use of the verb ἱερατεύω (to serve in the temple); Schrenk, TDNT 3:249.

23 Exod. 30:1–9; Marshall 1978: 54; Michaelis, TDNT 4:264. For this narrow use of ναός as "Holy Place," see 1 Macc. 1:21–22; Fitzmyer 1981: 323; Schrenk, TDNT 3:232.

23 The fathers/patriarchs are mentioned in John 7:22; Acts 3:13; 7:32; Rom. 9:5; 11:28; the promise is noted in Acts 13:32; 26:6; Rom. 15:8; Schrenk, TDNT 5:976 nn. 178 and 182. In Judaism, see 4 Macc. 16:20; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 2:5–7; 3:10–17.

29 Danker 1988: 48–49; Plummer 1896: 42; Hauck, TDNT 5:491 n. 24, 493. The combination is found elsewhere in Wis. 9:3 and Eph. 4:24. God seeks righteousness and worship even among the heathen: Acts 13:10, 16; 24:25; 10:35, 43; Schrenk, TDNT 2:199. In the OT, Josh. 24:14 is similar in thrust; Nolland 1989: 88.

30 "Most High" is another way to speak of heaven. To speak of "glory in the highest" (2:14; 19:38) is to call heaven to praise; Matt. 21:9; Luke 1:32, 35; Acts 7:48; Schrenk, TDNT 5:985 n. 253.

25 Hendriksen 1978: 141; Godet 1875: 1.129; Plummer 1896: 52. Schrenk, TDNT 5:1016–17, esp. n. 7, argues similarly. The term οἶκος refers to the whole house of a ruler, while πατριά is added, so that the reference to the whole house is clearly seen as a specific reference to ancestry.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

33 On the options, see Schrenk, TDNT 2:747–50, who also opts for the two-part line.

14 Schrenk, TDNT 2:189 §C2c. Δίκαιος is often used in the NT of the prophets or martyrs.

24 Schrenk, TDNT 3:236; Hyldahl 1961. The expression for the locale is almost unique for Jewish sources.

35 On διαλογισμός, see BAGD 186 §1; BAA 372 §1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:97 §B1. The term is often negative in the NT (Rom. 1:21; 1 Cor. 3:20; Mark 7:21; Matt. 15:19; Luke 2:35; 6:8; 9:47), with Rom. 14:1, where it means “reasoning,” being the only neutral use of the term. Matt. 9:4 has a synonymous term: ἐνθύμησις.

24 Creed 1930: 108. Against this idea is Schrenk, TDNT 1:635, who ties the phrase to God’s will, so that the idea is that “they rejected God’s will for themselves.” Word order favors Creed, though there is not much difference in the options.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various “books” mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

13 In Sir. 23:1, 4; 51:10 πατήρ often occurs alongside κύριος (Lord) or δεσπότης (master) (Schrenk, TDNT 5:979 n. 209, 981, 984–85). Elsewhere in Judaism at Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] nos. 4–6 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–57, 460); Wis. 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:3, 8. In the OT at Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; 64:8 [64:7 MT]; Jer. 3:4; Ps. 68:5 [68:6 MT]; 89:26 [89:27 MT] (of God's relationship to the king, as also 2 Sam. 7:14); Mal. 1:6; 2:10; 1 Chron. 29:10. As a NT term of intimacy, see Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6; Mark 14:36.

22 On the expression the fathers in Judaism, see Schrenk, TDNT 5:976–77; 1 Esdr. 1:11 [1:12 LXX]; 4:60; 1 Macc. 2:19; 2 Enoch 33.12; 35.2. On the theme of holy graves, see Jeremias 1958a and 1961.

7 Marshall notes that Levi's devotion to Torah is expressed in terms of a similar commitment in Deut. 33:9 and 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 15–16. Schrenk, TDNT 5:983, defines μισέω as "to set aside for."

14 Similarly high interest for items is found in ancient Egyptian documents; Derrett 1972b. The term τὰ γράμματα describes the promissory note; BAGD 165 §2a; BAA 330 §2b; Schrenk, TDNT 1:764–65; Fitzmyer 1985: 1100.

41 This key term links 16:9 and 16:11. In this context, ἀδικία is a Hebraistic "genitive of quality," describing the steward's character; Zerwick 1963: §40; Büchsel, TDNT 3:943 n. 2 (for κριτής). Schrenk, TDNT 1:157, calls it a "genitive of definition."

14 On “the law and the prophets,” see Luke 16:29, 31; Acts 13:15; 28:23; Schrenk, TDNT 1:756 n. 28; Friedrich, TDNT 6:832.

15 So Schrenk, TDNT 1:612, argues, while opting for Matthew’s version as the more original form in Q. But Chilton 1979: 205–23 argues that Luke’s saying is from Lucan Q, a version distinct from but parallel to Matthew’s Q. Chilton also defends the originality of Luke’s form of the saying. Given all the other anomalies in the text, it is more satisfactory to argue for distinct sources and settings.

14 So the comparative παρ’ (than); Klostermann 1929: 181; Schrenk, TDNT 2:215 n. 16. Cf. παρά in Ps. 44:8 [45:7 Engl.]; Luke 13:2; BDF §185.3; BDR §185.3 n. 5 and §246.5.

4 Luke often mentions written Scripture: Luke 4:17; 7:27; 10:26; 20:17; 21:22; 22:37; 24:44, 46; Acts 13:29; 24:14 (Schrenk, TDNT 1:748; Marshall 1978: 690).

14 Ellis 1974: 186 notes that the Qumranians in general were even stricter than the Pharisees; K. Schubert 1957: 127–28. CD 11.13–14 reads, “No one shall help an animal in its delivery on the Sabbath day. And if it falls into a pit or a ditch, one shall not raise it on the Sabbath.” For details of Jewish practice, see the exegesis of the next verse.

17 For a study of the hermeneutic of Luke’s OT use, see Bock 1987, in which I build on P. Schubert’s 1957 thesis that Luke’s theme is “proof from prophecy” (but the apologetic motif is not so strong in Luke as the declarative function of these texts, thus my modification to “proclamation from prophecy and pattern”). My work contrasts with that of Rese 1969, who underestimates the appeal to pattern and therefore understates a prophetic approach to Luke's OT. Soards 1994: 201 misconstrues the proof-from-prophecy position by describing it as linear, which does not reflect my view of the interaction between text and event in the proclamation-from-prophecy-and-pattern theme; see Bock 1987: 273.

33 Ireland 1992: 36, 41 reports that this view goes back to D. Schulz in 1821 and was tied to ancient practice by J. J. Van Oosterzee in 1859. It has recently been defended through appeal to Jewish practice by Derrett 1970: 48–77. Fitzmyer 1964 adds an additional twist to this view: this interest was the steward's commission, making his action of canceling the interest only a clever pretense of personal sacrifice.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

42 Marshall 1978: 70–71; Schweizer 1984: 29; Wiefel 1988: 53; Schulz, TDNT 7:400; Schweizer, TDNT 6:405; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.33.6.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

4 Schulz 1972: 371 n. 321, who also regards the material as late because of its pronouncement form and its orientation of John as subordinate to Jesus. However, the OT prophets are loaded with such pronouncements, and the view that the subordination of John to Jesus reflects late material turns on an approach that rejects the historical character of the tradition of Luke 1–3, a position discussed in the sources and historicity sections of 1:5–25 and 3:1–6, the additional notes on 1:25 and 3:3, and excursus 1.

8 Luke uses the singular form of ὄχλος twenty-five times and the plural sixteen times in his Gospel; in Acts, the singular occurs fifteen times and the plural seven times; Marshall 1978: 138; Fitzmyer 1981: 467. Schulz 1972: 366 n. 285 is confident the change is Luke's because of his usage of this term.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

15 Liefeld 1984: 864; Schulz 1972: 187 n. 98; Foerster, TDNT 5:486; Manson 1949: 44. The picture of the "high mountain" is almost regal imagery and recalls how rulers often lived high on a mountain over their subjects. Such "heavenly journeys" are not unusual: 2 Cor. 12:2–3. C. F. Evans 1990: 258 cites as parallel Deut. 34:1–4, where Moses sees the promised land from a mountain.

28 Schulz 1972: 180 regards the addition as Lucan, but the evidence is not there to make this conclusion.

36 Marshall 1978: 173 notes the options. Schulz 1972: 180 argues that Matthew is secondary.

37 Dupont 1968: 58–59. So also Schulz 1972: 180, citing for the use of this verb Acts 2:16 and 13:40, which themselves may reflect traditional expressions. Nolland 1989: 181 gives the most plausible explanation: Jesus refuses to match γέγραπται, which the devil used in 4:10. The form εἴρηται does not appear elsewhere in the NT, which suggests a traditional use more than a Lucan change.

3 Schulz 1972: 237–38 and nn. 410–11, on the basis of Lucan vocabulary in 7:3–6. Most of the cases of Lucan vocabulary depend on Acts, which must also be reckoned to have traditional material, so that some of Schulz's evidence is not as strong as it at first appears. Here also belongs Fitzmyer 1981: 649, who sees as Lucan vv. 1a, 3b–6d, 7a, part of 9, 10a.

33 Luce 1933: 160 and Schulz 1972: 380, with most, argue that Luke made the shift to the second person, but it is hard to know which direction the difference went. If the account has polemical roots, a second-person reference may have been the starting point. Schürmann 1969: 426 calls the remark an indictment of the audience.

1 Dibelius 1934: 160–61, esp. 160 n. 1, says that the general nature of the remark shows that it comes from the evangelist, but how "general principles" can come from the evangelist is not clear. It is the unique attestation of this saying in Luke that appears to be the only reason for this conclusion, along with its possible use of OT imagery from Gen. 19:26. The Jesus Seminar sees these verses as going back to Luke, claiming that the saying assumes too much self-identity for disciples (Funk and Hoover 1993: 316 prints it in black type). But the distinctive behavior and identity are already indicated in the first two sayings, which the seminar accepts. On the rejection of other attempts to argue that the early church is responsible for the sayings, see Marshall 1978: 409, in particular his evaluation of Schulz

1972: 435 n. 239, who relies on Dibelius. Glombitza 1971 also makes a case for Lucan creation.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson 1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like "hand of God" (1:66) and "arm of God" (1:51).

5 But so Schulz 1972: 301–9; rightly refuted by Marshall 1978: 559–60. Multiple levels of the parable tradition (see n. 1 above) teach the kingdom's gradual growth and contrastive transformation. In addition, even the parables of this section appear in various wings of the tradition (Mark and Q [or Matthew]), so that multiple attestation speaks for authenticity. Jeremias 1963a: 146 n. 68 notes the Palestinian coloring in the parables, a point in favor of authenticity. Even the Jesus Seminar accepts the essential authenticity of these parables, printing 13:18–19 in pink type and 13:20–21 in red (Funk and Hoover 1993: 346–47).

1 Also Schulz 1972: 391–98; Crossan 1973: 72; Fitzmyer 1985: 1052. Jeremias 1963a: 63–64, 176 argues that the Gospel of Thomas may be more original than Matthew, except for its expansion of excuses. The Thomas parable is closer to Luke than to Matthew and so is often discussed with Luke's version, but it introduces a fourth figure who cannot come to the banquet. Thomas gives no setting, since the document is just a list of teachings. But the excuses in Thomas use more urban imagery; Luke's use of agrarian imagery fits Jesus' tendency to use agrarian illustrations. Horsley 1987: 180 sees Luke as the more original of the versions, noting that the economically prosperous are the excluded; so also the Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 352), though it regards the symposium-table setting as Lucan.

10 For details, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.246–50, 287; Wiefel 1988: 47; Schrenk, TDNT 3:262; and esp. Jeremias 1969: 199.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

25 Exod. 29:38–42; Num. 28:3–8; Schürer 1973–87: 2.301–3.

26 Schürer 1973–87: 2.300–301, esp. n. 30; Josephus, Antiquities 14.4.3 §65; m. Pesaḥ. 5.1.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

16 Schürmann 1969: 228; Ellis 1974: 96; Marshall 1978: 181. For the wording of the Shemoneh Esreh, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–61.

17 Schrage, TDNT 7:810–26, 828–33; Schürer 1973–87: 2.423–63, esp. 447–54; Safrai 1976c: 927–33; Billerbeck 1964.

25 Schürer 1973–87: 2.381–403; R. Meyer and H. Weiss, TDNT 9:11–48. For Luke and the Pharisees, see Carroll 1988.

2 Schürer 1890: 105–43. The recent revision of Schürer's work (1973–87: 1.399–427) changes little of the original discussion. Schürer summarizes what was already an old debate, going back at least to Strauss 1972: 152–56 (originally 1835), as noted by Nolland 1989: 99.

3 Both Klostermann 1929: 32–33 and Hoehner 1977: 14 use Schürer as a starting point.

13 In Sir. 23:1, 4; 51:10 πατήρ often occurs alongside κύριος (Lord) or δεσπότης (master) (Schrenk, TDNT 5:979 n. 209, 981, 984–85). Elsewhere in Judaism at Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] nos. 4–6 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–57, 460); Wis. 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:3, 8. In the OT at Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; 64:8 [64:7 MT]; Jer. 3:4; Ps. 68:5 [68:6 MT]; 89:26 [89:27 MT] (of God's relationship to the king, as also 2 Sam. 7:14); Mal. 1:6; 2:10; 1 Chron. 29:10. As a NT term of intimacy, see Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6; Mark 14:36.

16 Translation from Jeremias 1971a: 198. See also Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 3 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456, 460). However, Jesus' prayer is more like Jewish "short" prayers than this long Jewish liturgical prayer; C. A. Evans 1990: 182. As such, the prayer's form and function come as no surprise in a Jewish context.

35 On gathering as a figure of bringing together God's people, see Michel, TDNT 7:419–20, who also interprets the imagery as picturing a harvest. Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 10 (= Schürer 1973–

87: 2.457) reads: “Blessed are you, Lord, who gathers the dispersed of your people Israel.”

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

1 There are various ways to list the parallels. With only minor variations, I follow Schürmann’s list (1969: 59 n. 132). For other arrangements and discussions, see Tiede 1988: 45–47; R. Brown 1977: 293–98; Schneider 1977a: 48; and Creed 1930: 13.

5 The arguments here are complex, based on a variety of suppositions, and thus come in a variety of forms. Schürmann 1969: 56–57; Bovon 1989: 64–70; and Schneider 1977a: 48–49 have brief discussions of the details, as does Marshall 1978: 63. Most discussions center on 1:34, so more detail awaits treatment of that verse. Other details related to the discussion are treated as they arise in the verses.

22 For this allusion, see Marshall 1978: 66; Leaney 1958: 83; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 46, esp. n. 40; uncertain of it is R. Brown 1977: 299–300; Laurentin 1967: 115.

33 Zechariah asks “how shall I know this?” versus Mary’s “how can this be?” Zechariah asks for a sign; Godet 1875: 1.92; Plummer 1896: 24;

Schürmann 1969: 49.

37 Creed 1930: 19; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 49–50; Fitzmyer 1981: 348–50; Wiefel 1988: 51–52; Ernst 1977: 72; R. Brown 1977: 309. Gewiess, in an appendix to Laurentin's German 1967 edition, interestingly takes a view opposite of Laurentin in the French original and omits Laurentin's own discussion of the question.

43 Fitzmyer 1981: 352 mentions Luke 2:23 and Isa. 4:3; Schweizer 1984: 30 adds Isa. 35:8; 62:12; Exod. 13:12; and Lev. 23:2 to show the variety of objects called "holy"; Schürmann 1969: 54 notes that 1 John 2:20 and Rev. 3:7 apply the description to Jesus.

1 Schürmann 1969: 64 notes that the sign of the leaping baby is explicit in the passage, while the fulfillment is implicitly presented in the sign. C. F. Evans 1990: 168 rightly calls this a "linchpin" passage.

2 Schürmann 1969: 78 at nn. 259–60, though holding a different view, raises the Semitism issue.

5 Machen 1930: 95–97; Marshall 1978: 79; Schürmann 1969: 79 (who argues that Mary is related to 1:46–49 and that the additional elements came from the community).

19 R. Brown 1977: 337; BDF §493.2; BDR §493.2–3; Büchsel, TDNT 1:663. This is called "distributive doubling." Schürmann 1969: 75 n. 231 prefers the translation "for many generations" with BDF.

1 Schürmann 1969: 96 notes the possibility of a Baptist origin, but thinks the source is more likely to be Jewish Christian. R. Brown 1977: 376 opts for a Jewish-Christian source as well. Marshall 1978: 86 is uncertain where the origin lies.

14 Exod. 13:3; 15:6; Isa. 5:12; 26:11; 31:3; Ps. 28:5; 1 Chron. 28:19; Creed 1930: 25; Marshall 1978: 90. In the NT, Acts 7:50; Lohse, TDNT 9:431 §C3. Schürmann 1969: 83 n. 20 notes that only Luke uses the phrase "the hand of the Lord" in the NT (Acts 11:21; 13:11; in the LXX, Isa. 41:20; 66:14).

4 The most detailed recent survey of the issues is Farris 1985: 26–30. Other treatments include R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Fitzmyer 1981: 376–78; Marshall 1978: 86–87; Ernst 1977: 92–94; Wiefel 1988: 62–64; Nolland 1989: 82–85; and Schürmann 1969: 84–85, 88–89, 93–94.

5 R. Brown 1977: 377. Schürmann 1969: 84 n. 26 notes traces of non-Lucan style and argues for a Palestinian setting. Bovon 1989: 98 and n. 8 argues that the terms to make redemption, horn of salvation, and to remember covenant are not Lucan expressions, though the terms to go before, knowledge, and salvation are like Lucan usage.

7 Among the hypotheses are the following:

	Added to	Adherents
1:76–79	Jewish or Jewish-Christian hymn	Winter 1956: 239 n. 41
1:76 or 1:76–77	early Christian hymn	Benoit 1956–57: 182–91
1:68–75	Christian hymn	Schürmann 1969: 88–90

1:76–77, 79b	Baptist hymn	Hahn 1969: 242–43, 365–66
1:76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn of the Anawim	R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Farris 1985: 27–28
1:70, 76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn probably from the Anawim	Fitzmyer 1981: 378

34 Schürmann 1969: 91 n. 67; Hendriksen 1978: 131; Wiefel 1988: 65; BDF §400.6. Bovon 1989: 108 correctly states that John has a foot in each era, since as the last of the prophets of promise he sets the table for the new era (Luke 7:26; 16:16).

40 Schlier, TDNT 1:352–53; Schürmann 1969: 92; BDB 855. When a plant is the image in the OT, a Davidite is in view; Nolland 1989: 90.

50 See discussions in Schürmann 1969: 94–95; Schweizer 1984: 44; R. Brown 1977: 376 n. 2; Bovon 1989: 110. Godet 1875: 1.118 refutes the older view that John was an Essene. The similarity between the two groups suggests that if John did not belong to one group, he probably was not a member of the other either.

2 Major discussions can be found in Fitzmyer 1981: 392–93; R. Brown 1977: 411; Klostermann 1929: 31–32; Creed 1930: 30–32; Schürmann

1969: 103–4, 108–9, 118–19; Marshall 1978: 96–97; Plummer 1896: 46; Nolland 1989: 98–103; and Ernst 1977: 99.

6 Schürmann 1969: 108–9, 118 also argues that the shepherd motif is Palestinian and that OT allusions reflect the MT.

20 Exod. 13:2; Num. 3:12–13; Deut. 21:15–17; Schürmann 1969: 104 n. 43. Both Fitzmyer 1981: 406 and R. Brown 1977: 398 note that the term shows only that no one preceded Jesus.

21 Exod. 13:2; Num. 3:12; Schürmann 1969: 104 n. 43; Fitzmyer 1981: 407–8; Frey 1930; Michaelis, TDNT 6:876–77 and n. 36; Bovon 1989: 121 n. 38.

22 Exod. 4:24. The meaning “dining room” is found in 1 Sam. 1:18 and Sir. 14:25; BAGD 414; BAA 841; Schürmann 1969: 105; Stählin, TDNT 5:19–20 nn. 136, 143.

24 Fitzmyer 1981: 406; ANET 489. Schürmann 1969: 102 n. 30 notes that Plummer’s option is a popular etymology.

3 Ἀγραυλοῦντες means “to make one’s field [into] one’s courtyard or house”; BAGD 13; BAA 23; Schürmann 1969: 108. Shepherds would often work together to provide this protection; Jeremias, TDNT 6:499. Jeremias (pp. 490–91) also points out that the account is not influenced by any literary traditions.

4 Schürmann 1969: 108–9. Ezek. 34 is a negative OT text, but even here it is the perversion of the shepherd’s care that is in view. Israel’s leaders are portrayed as doing something unnatural in their care for the nation.

17 Fitzmyer 1981: 410 cites the formulas of praise or confession in Bar. 2:17–18; 1 Esdr. 9:8; 4 Macc. 1:12; Rom. 11:36; and Heb. 13:21. See also Schürmann 1969: 113. Nolland 1989: 108 mentions Ps. Sol. 18.10. The formula corresponds to the Semitic “Hosanna”; Lohse, TDNT 9:683, esp. n. 14.

23 Schürmann 1969: 117 n. 160; Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:151; B. Meyer 1964: 43. The remark argues that the events, like revelation of an apocalyptic secret, transcend human understanding and require reflection.

25 Schürmann 1969: 117–18 notes the unique Lucan usage in 2:19 involving the specific form of Mary’s name; fourteen of the twenty-seven uses of Μαριάμ are in Luke–Acts (but eleven of these are in the infancy material, so the usage may reflect sources). In addition, all six NT uses of συμβάλλω are in Luke–Acts. Also tied up in this point is a textual issue (see the additional notes on 2:19). I read Μαρία here, a reading that makes the possibility of Lucan composition less likely.

2 Bultmann 1963: 299, 304 regards this setting as artificial and erroneous, since the firstborn child is presented at the temple, which was not required by the law. Schürmann 1969: 119–20, 131 speaks of editorial work from Hellenistic Christianity, though he still insists that the bulk of the tradition is Jewish-Christian because of its heavy emphasis on Israel and its traces of a Palestinian setting (the only other verse he questions is 2:27). He places the origin in a setting similar to 1:5–25 and 1:57–79. Nolland 1989: 115 argues for Luke’s hand in 2:22–24, 39; but the non-LXX form of the OT citation is against 2:22–24 being from Luke’s hand. In Nolland’s view (p. 116), the rest is substantially from a source, with 2:25, 38 serving as Lucan editorial links. He also sees possible Lucan elements in 2:33–35.

4 Creed 1930: 37–38 mentions these associations and rejects them, as do Bultmann 1963: 299–300 and Schürmann 1969: 131 n. 244. The comparison was described by Aufhauser 1926 and defended by Garbe 1959: 47–49, but there are just too many differences between these accounts.

9 So ℵ, A, B, L, Byz; so read most translations. Schürmann 1969: 121 n. 180 and Marshall 1978: 116 discuss this textual problem.

1 The view is old. Those who hold it include Bultmann 1963: 300; Creed 1930: 44; Klostermann 1929: 45; Schürmann 1969: 139; Schneider 1977a: 76; Wiefel 1988: 82; and Fitzmyer 1981: 435–36. About the only one who raises doubts is Marshall 1978: 126. Despite the remarks about sources, Coleridge 1993: 187–213 is certainly correct that from a narrative viewpoint this pericope could not be dropped without substantial loss to the infancy narrative. Jesus' remarks about himself are a fitting climax to the prologue. In Coleridge's words (p. 189), this unit is "the most important" of the infancy narrative.

2 Schürmann 1969: 139 notes numerous Semitisms in earlier accounts and says this account has more unmistakable traces of Greek and Lucan expression. The most influential study here is Van Iersel 1960.

3 Schürmann 1969: 139, esp. n. 300, notes the positive attitude to the law, the temple focus, and the possible traces of Semitic elements.

1 Marshall 1978: 131 defends a break in Luke's Gospel before 4:14 by noting that Jesus' ministry really begins at this verse. Schürmann 1969: 146–48 sees the break at 4:44.

12 Against this view is Schürmann 1969: 155; in favor of a wide-ranging minstry is Marshall 1978: 135. The reference to the entire region suggests that Marshall is correct.

5 It is possible that Luke described the dialogue in 3:12–14 with his own words, but the call for concrete repentance fits the work of a prophet. Ernst 1977: 143 argues that the question-and-answer style and the theme of care for fellow humans are like Luke. However, more likely is that the material has a traditional base, since the style is not as Lucan as Ernst suggests. So correctly argues Schürmann 1969: 169 n. 53, who with Marshall 1978: 142 notes numerous peculiarities that Luke does not have elsewhere. The Semitisms in 3:7–9 suggest the age of the material; see the exegesis of 3:8–9 for details.

11 Schürmann 1969: 164 n. 21. On "coming wrath" in Judaism, see Jub. 15.34; Ps. Sol. 15.4; 1 Enoch 84.4–6; C. F. Evans 1990: 239.

14 Schürmann 1969: 164; Tannehill 1986: 50, 145. The failure of such an appeal is evident in 16:24, 27, 30.

19 Black goes on to argue that 3:9 originally followed 3:7, but such an argument is unnecessary since the imagery of 3:8–9 is the same; Schürmann 1969: 166 n. 33.

1 Schürmann 1969: 171 n. 64 notes that most of the terms from 3:15–18 (which is §16 in Aland 1985) show up elsewhere in Luke predominately where he has parallels. Ernst 1977: 145 calls the introduction Lucan, but with less rationale.

4 Schürmann 1969: 172 n. 75. See the exegesis of 3:21–22 and note the OT background there.

4 I have left untranslated the term Geschichte, which normally means "the significance of history" as opposed to mere "event." Schürmann's point, it appears, is that the event is not so much described as explained. It is a “Christ-history revelatory event.”

23 Bock 1987: 99–101. Note also the discussions rejecting this reading in Schürmann 1969: 193–94 and Marshall 1978: 154–55.

5 Ernst 1977: 155 speaks of a theological, not a biographical, reason for the number. Schürmann 1969: 199 nn. 76, 79 sees only the Davidic reference as key and does not deny a historical value to the number. In the Greco-Roman world, men were called to public service at thirty; Dionysius Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 4.6; C. F. Evans 1990: 254.

10 Acts 17:28–29 is clearly conceptually parallel; Schürmann 1969: 202. The idea of God as Creator of all humanity is the basis of Paul’s approach to Gentiles with the gospel; less specific but similar in force is Acts 14:15.

2 Schürmann 1969: 218–19 sees both Mark and Q as contributing to Luke, as does Bultmann 1963: 254.

4 Schürmann 1969: 218; so also Schneider 1977a: 99; C. F. Evans 1990: 256 (who incorrectly calls this the majority view); and Manson 1949: 42–43 (but with no details other than the claim that Matthew’s order makes “a fine dramatic climax” so it is hard to imagine Luke’s altering it if it were the original).

12 Schürmann also rejects any repetition of the manna miracle as being in view here. For details on the Jewish practice of fasting, see the exegesis of 5:33.

18 Schürmann 1969: 211 n. 176 notes that this difference suggests a source and also notes some ten passages in Luke–Acts where Rome is treated mostly positively: Luke 3:12–14; 20:20–26; 21:12–13; 22:25; 23:4, 13–16, 22; Acts 10:1–11:18; 13:6–12; 16:11–40; 18:12–16; 25:1–26:32. However, Luke is capable of attacking the leaders of Rome, though that is not his usual approach; see Acts 4:24–29.

9 Leaney 1958: 50–54. Schürmann 1969: 227–28, 241–42 says the source is Q; so also Busse 1978: 113–14 (though he sees Q's influence as more conceptual than verbal, which makes Luke very responsible for the account); Nolland 1989: 192.

16 Schürmann 1969: 228; Ellis 1974: 96; Marshall 1978: 181. For the wording of the Shemoneh Esreh, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–61.

35 Ps. 45:2 [44:3 LXX]; Col. 4:6; Acts 14:3; 20:32; Schürmann 1969: 234 n. 92. Nolland 1989: 198–99 argues that it refers to the cause of marvel: the words were endued with the power of God's grace. But this also is too positive, given their rejection.

36 Schürmann 1969: 236 §d notes that the expression υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ might conceal an Aramaism. He also sees a connection to John 6:42 and suggests that Luke's version is old.

47 On the elements of Lucan and non-Lucan style in the verse, see Schürmann 1969: 227 n. 45. He argues that the name Nazareth and the reference to Jesus' being reared in Nazareth are not Lucan, since ἀνατρέφω is used in Acts 7:20–21 and 22:3. Τρέφω (to rear) occurs only here in the NT with this meaning, though Luke 23:29; Rev. 12:6, 14 are close in sense: "to nourish, nurture" (BAGD 825; BAA 1645–46).

15 Schürmann 1969: 247–48 n. 194 prefers the imperative and cites Luke 22:51 and 4:41 as conceptual support. He says the use of the interjection in prose is rare.

16 Schürmann 1969: 248 n. 195. Seesemann, TDNT 5:117–18, rightly calls it a “defensive formula,” not a confession.

21 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:330, says that Peter is regarded as a sinner “by the community.” Van Der Loos 1965: 671 agrees with the above assessment of the fishing occupation, while Schürmann 1969: 270 n. 54 disagrees, noting that no evidence exists for this view of fishermen in the first century; so also SB 1:187. Schürmann is surely right here.

3 Mark 1:16–20 and Luke 5:1–11 are two form parallels; Bovon 1989: 252; Berger 1984: 316 (discusses the parallel in Mark 2:14); V. Taylor 1935: 75. Schürmann 1969: 287 speaks of an apophthegm for the whole account, which combines a call with a controversy account.

9 Luke 14:33 has a similar phrase. The parallels of Matt. 9:9b and Mark 2:14b are otherwise virtually identical. Luke uses a vivid imperfect tense, which he prefers, instead of the aorist of Matt. and Mark to say that Levi “followed” Jesus. Note also Mark 1:18, 20; 14:50; and Luke 5:11; Schürmann 1969: 288 n. 9.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

17 Schürmann 1969: 291 n. 28 notes that Mark and Matthew reflect an Aramaism with οἱ ἰσχύοντες. If so, the alteration of wording is Luke’s rendering of the figure. The other difference is that Matt. 9:12 and Mark 2:17 agree against Luke in their introductions to Jesus’ saying: “and hearing, Jesus/he said,” versus Luke’s “and replying, Jesus said to them.” All the Synoptic writers use ἰσχύω (Matthew four times, Mark four times, Luke eight times in his Gospel and six times in Acts), but Luke is the only Gospel writer to use ὑγιαίνω (Luke 5:31; 7:10; 15:27). Two of Luke's three uses have Synoptic parallels.

11 Schürmann 1969: 300–301, 306 speaks of a Sabbath conflict for both 6:1–5 and 6:6–11. In addition, a controversy saying is the focus of 6:6–11. It is hard to know whether a conflict pronouncement story or a miracle account is present, since both elements exist. The issue is whether the miracle or the saying is more central, which is a tough call. Bultmann 1963: 12 calls it a controversy account occasioned by a healing of Jesus. Bovon 1989: 273 rightly calls it a mixed form, combining a controversy with a miracle account.

16 For this view are Schürmann 1969: 296; Hendriksen 1978: 309; Wiefel 1988: 121 (perhaps). Against it is Marshall 1978: 226. Bovon 1989: 261 thinks that any specific allusion to the cross or ascension is unlikely and prefers to refer only to the period of the church. The key terms are ἀπαρθῇ in Luke and two forms of αἴρω in Isa. 53.

36 Riesenfeld, TDNT 8:147; Schürmann 1969: 306 n. 48; Bovon 1989: 274 n. 24; Ps. 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; Dan. 6:12 (with τηρέω); BAGD 622 §1aβ; BAA 1258 §1aβ. Today, παρατηρέω (to watch lurkingly) makes one think of a spy novel.

39 Luke 6:33 (twice) and 6:35 use the term ἀγαθοποιέω; Ernst 1977: 205; Schürmann 1969: 308; Busse 1979: 140 perceptively notes the conceptual tie to 9:11 and 4:18.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice).

Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

43 Among those who support this approach are Schürmann 1969: 302; Vogt 1959; Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; and apparently Danker 1988: 130. Marshall 1978: 230 is uncertain of the origin.

44 For more recent discussion, see Käser 1968; Schürmann 1969: 304 n. 29; Marshall 1978: 233; Fitzmyer 1981: 610 (who ties it to the apocryphal gospel tradition); Wiefel 1988: 123 (who rejects a connection to Jesus); and Bovon 1989: 267.

3 Marshall 1978: 237 notes that Luke may have had an alternate list of the Twelve, but he regards the evidence as weak. Schürmann 1969: 318–19, 323 is confident that Luke had a form of what he calls the “Catalogue of the Apostles” (a name that notes the passage’s form), which differed from Mark and derived from Q. Bovon 1989: 278 also sees additional source material here beyond Mark, since the apostolic list had various forms, as Acts 1:13 shows. Nolland 1989: 265 speaks only of the influences of another tradition. Though he is less certain of another full list used by Luke, he thinks one existed because of the inclusion of Judas son of James and the absence of Thaddaeus. The differences in the lists will be noted in the exegesis.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

10 Simon-Peter, Thomas-Didymus, Matthew-Levi, Bartholomew-Nathanael (apparently, see the exegesis of 6:14); Plummer 1896: 172, 174; Schürmann 1969: 317–18 n. 49; Jeremias 1971a: 232–33. These variations suggest that the tradition of the list of the Twelve existed in various forms.

5 It should be noted that others argue for a change to the third person by Matthew, e.g., Manson 1949: 47. Schürmann 1969: 329 argues that Luke's source had a second person, while Jesus used the third person originally.

17 Strathmann, TDNT 4:51. Schürmann 1969: 321 adds to the new Moses motif here by alluding to the people meeting Moses in Exod. 19:12, 14, 17, 21–25; 20:18–21; 24:2; 34:3, 29–30. But how certain is this in light of the various groups noted here? There is no idea of Jesus' receiving new revelation from God in the journey up the mountain, only the picture of communing with him in prayer. As was mentioned above, the OT texts keep people at a distance versus engaging them.

18 Fitzmyer 1981: 624, Schürmann 1969: 322, and Bovon 1989: 286 are certain about the Gentile allusion (Luke 2:31–32; 3:6; 4:25–29). Ernst 1977: 212, Marshall 1978: 242, and Tiede 1988: 136 are more cautious.

29 Marshall 1978: 252; Schürmann 1969: 335–36. Jeremias 1971a: 239–40 notes that these warnings of persecution occur in every strand of Gospel tradition, showing their widespread presence and association to Jesus. Schürmann notes conceptual Lucan parallels in 11:49–52 and 12:11–12. They sound like Matt. 5:11. For a pre-Easter setting, he notes Matt. 10:28–31, 34–39; Mark 6:14–29; 11:1–11, 15–18 as giving evidence of pre-Easter tension.

32 Schürmann 1969: 334 n. 63 shows that the term is not a technical term for the end-time judgment, though he opts too narrowly for a synagogue connection.

50 BAGD 83–84; BAA 167; Godet 1875: 1.326; Creed 1930: 95; Marshall 1978: 264; Fitzmyer 1981: 640; Schürmann 1969: 355 n. 90; Bultmann, TDNT 2:533–34.

60 Hendriksen 1978: 362. Schürmann 1969: 372 notes that the second-person speech is against an original reference to the Pharisees, since they are rebuked in this way only in Luke 14:7–11. In addition, the term ὑποκριτής is not always used of Pharisees, as Matt. 24:51 and Luke 12:56 show. He sees the address as to the disciples, but not limited to them.

66 Schürmann 1969: 382 n. 19. Luke uses the comparative ὅμοιος in 6:47, 48, 49; 7:31, 32; 12:36.

73 Bovon 1989: 298 lists other reasons: Luke's knowledge of the woe form (10:13; 11:42–52; 17:1; 21:23; 22:22); Lucan opposition of rich and poor; Lucan opposition of hungry and filled in 1:53; Lucan vocabulary (πλήν, καλῶς εἴπωσιν, and πάντες οἱ ἄνθρωποι); and the second-person address of the woes (which fits Luke's second-person beatitudes). But Schürmann argues that Luke never creates woes and that the verses evidence non-Lucan vocabulary in using πλούσιος and πεινάω; see 1969: 337–38 nn. 86, 88, 96, and 105.

2 Bovon 1989: 346 n. 5 notes that among many Protestant scholars this has been the major position for some time and that only recently have Catholic commentaries like those of Schürmann, Schneider, and Fitzmyer come to accept this approach.

4 Schürmann 1969: 395–96; Carson 1984: 200; Liefeld 1984: 897–98. Also noting four options is Busse 1979: 142 n. 3: (1) Luke added the detail, (2) Luke is truer to Q than is Matthew, (3) Luke had another source, and (4) Luke received a pre-Lucan expansion of Q. Busse cannot decide between views 1 and 4. Wiefel 1988: 142 opts for view 4.

5 Πόλις is used in its broadest sense of inhabited area here and refers to a village; BAGD 685; BAA 1375 §1; Bovon 1989: 360–61 notes the present size of Nein, as does Schürmann 1969: 399.

6 For Q as the basic source, see Schürmann 1969: 413, 418; Marshall 1978: 287; Fitzmyer 1981: 662–63; Tiede 1988: 153; Wiefel 1988: 148; Bovon 1989: 369. Those who prefer Matthean priority argue that Luke used Matthew. Luke 7:20–21, 29–30 does not have a parallel in Matthew.

8 Schürmann 1969: 408 n. 8, 409 argues that John's question speaks of kingdom hope in general. John's question was, "Do you bring the kingdom and the promise of God?" This may be a correct way to view the question's force, but behind it must lie a messianic implication, when the other options are rejected. This may be why Marshall 1978: 290 speaks of a vague messianic expectation. Wiefel 1988: 149 notes two options for "Coming

One”: an allusion to Dan. 7:13 [Theodotion] with its apocalyptic judge or to Hab. 2:3, which at Qumran was used with apocalyptic, eschatological force. On Hab. 2:3, see Strobel 1961b: 265–77.

9 Schürmann 1969: 410 n. 18, 396 n. 49 cites Matthean contraction in 12:2–6, 46–50; 8:14–15, 28–34; 9:18–26; 14:2; 18:1. On arguments for Lucan expansion, see the additional note on 7:20–21.

10 Only the reference to lepers is not found in these OT texts; Schürmann 1969: 412.

12 For a figurative force are Fitzmyer 1981: 671, 673–74; Hendriksen 1978: 395–96; Arndt 1956: 212; Marshall 1978: 294; Ernst 1977: 250; Schürmann 1969: 416 n. 53 (who mentions that such a reed, Phragmites communis, could grow to a height of sixteen feet).

21 Matt. 21:31–32 shows that such comments were in the tradition. Schürmann 1969: 422–23 argues that the comment may have been in Luke’s source.

25 Matt. 11:16 has τὴν γενεὰν ταύτην only. Luke’s expanded form is slightly more intense and individualizing; Schürmann 1969: 423 n. 112.

28 Leaney 1958: 145; Godet 1875: 1.354–55; Creed 1930: 108; Schürmann 1969: 423–24; Fitzmyer 1981: 680. Geldenhuys 1951: 231 n. 15 notes that the couplet has rhyme in Aramaic.

33 Luce 1933: 160 and Schulz 1972: 380, with most, argue that Luke made the shift to the second person, but it is hard to know which direction the difference went. If the account has polemical roots, a second-person reference may have been the starting point. Schürmann 1969: 426 calls the remark an indictment of the audience.

36 On “wisdom’s children,” see Sir. 4:11; Prov. 8:32–33. On wisdom personified, see Prov. 1:20–33; 8:1–9:6; 1 Enoch 42; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:10; Wis. 7:22–11:1; Schürmann 1969: 427; Nolland 1989: 346.

8 Jeremias 1963a: 126, 132 opts for either a prostitute or a woman in a dishonorable vocation, by which he means either an immoral or a dishonest vocation; Jeremias 1969: 303–12; Fitzmyer 1981: 689; Black 1967: 181–83. Marshall 1978: 308 notes correctly that the sins seem to be hers, so that her reputation is not because of association with someone else; so also Wiefel 1988: 154, who thinks she is a prostitute, as does Schürmann 1969: 431 n. 8.

9 Luke 7:37, 38, 46; 23:56; BAGD 529–30; BAA 1072; Michaelis, TDNT 4:800–801; Schürmann 1969: 432 n. 10. The importance of μύρον is shown by its use as perfume and its presence in the cult to purify priests, in the tabernacle for festal occasions, and by its use in burial to prevent stench and decay; Exod. 30:25–30; Josephus, Antiquities 3.8.6 §205; 19.9.1 §358; Luke 23:56. If this perfume were nard (Mark 14:3 = John 12:3), it would have cost about 300 denarii a pound, or the annual wage of a day laborer; BAGD 534; BAA 1080.

7 The phrase κατὰ πόλιν καὶ κώμην (from city to village) has a distributive force and is grammatically linked to the reference to traveling; Fitzmyer 1981: 697; Arndt 1956: 223; Schürmann 1969: 445 n. 5.

14 So Schürmann 1969: 447 n. 29. Hengel 1963 argues that these women became important witnesses in the church, as their involvement in the resurrection accounts makes clear.

6 D. Wenham 1972. Schürmann 1969: 461 agrees only for 8:9–10. Fitzmyer 1981: 700–701 apparently rejects this suggestion but without clear support.

10 Schürmann 1969: 452 n. 57 notes that the construction is Lucan, since only a few of the fifty-six Lucan examples are paralleled in Matthew or Mark. The introduction is Lucan.

15 Gen. 26:12 speaks of Isaac's hundredfold yield, but that text has no clear connection to Luke. It is debated whether this is a normal or exaggerated yield; Nolland 1989: 371–72 opts for a high yield. On the ancient custom of measuring a yield twice, see Song Rab. 7.3.3 on 7:3. Normal yields ranged from sevenfold to tenfold (Schürmann 1969: 454 n. 78), so that a hundredfold return is exceptional.

30 On "those outside" as traditional terminology, see Schürmann 1969: 460 n. 110; 1 Cor. 5:12–13; Col. 4:5; 1 Thess. 4:12; 1 Tim. 3:7.

36 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 9:29–33; Plummer 1896: 220. The imagery of 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 8:41–44 is close to this parable; Fitzmyer 1981: 712; Schürmann 1969: 463 n. 131. 1 Enoch 62.8 speaks of sowing saints.

4 Schürmann adds the point that Jesus is saying that these events do not occur in a corner (Acts 26:26).

4 So also Danker 1988: 179 (with a little hesitancy); Ellis 1974: 127. Fitzmyer 1981: 725 rightly rejects this view, as do Schürmann 1969: 470 n. 197; Marshall 1978: 332; and Wiefel 1988: 162.

5 Luke often speaks of the "word of God": Luke 5:1; 8:11; and twelve times in Acts; Schürmann 1969: 267 n. 29.

1 Overcoming such forces is important to Luke: Acts 13:6–11; 16:16–18; 19:13–17; Schürmann 1969: 480 n. 54.

6 That Matthew may have accompanied Jesus lends credence to the added detail of the second demoniac. The extent of the agreement between Mark and Luke leads most to see Mark as the source for Luke; so Schürmann 1969: 487; Schramm 1971: 90; Marshall 1978: 335; Fitzmyer 1981: 733; Wiefel 1988: 165–66. Bovon 1989: 432 is so impressed with these agreements that he argues that this account stands against the two-Gospel (or Griesbach) hypothesis. What could have caused Luke to go his own way against Matthew?

28 Ἅπαν τὸ πλῆθος is a Lucan expression; see Schürmann 1969: 486 n. 100; Luke 19:37; 23:1; Acts 25:24.

10 For ὄχλος in Luke, see 4:42; 5:1, 3, 15, 19, 29; 6:17, 19; 7:9, 11, 12, 24; 8:4, 19, 40, 42, 45; 9:11, 12, 16, 18, 37, 38; 11:14, 27, 29; 12:1, 13, 54; 14:25; 18:36; 19:3, 39; 22:6, 47; 23:4, 48. In 8:40–56, ὄχλος is synonymous to λαός (people), as 8:47 shows. Ὄχλος recalls the interested group of 8:4, 19. Pointing to 8:47, Bovon 1989: 446 sees a more expectant crowd and speaks of their eschatological hope as they await Jesus, but the term is more neutral here. Schürmann 1969: 489 rightly speaks of their expectation of miracles, as Mark 6:53–56 indicates. See the exegesis of Luke 8:4.

14 His phrase ἐσχάτως ἔχει equals our slang term “has reached the end.” Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 133 notes the idiom in Phrynichus, Eclogues 389 (which should be corrected to §368). Mark also notes that Jairus asked Jesus to lay hands on the girl, a point also found in Matt. 9:18. Mark and Matthew cite the request, while Luke only summarizes it.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as “legendary.” He suggests a cure by “auto-suggestion,” a rationalistic description that rejects the account’s portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of “grace” as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

33 Plummer 1896: 235; Marshall 1978: 344; Fitzmyer 1981: 746; Bovon 1989: 445–46 (who argues that Luke may be responsible for it); Creed 1930: 123; and Hendriksen 1978: 466 appear undecided. Arndt 1956: 246 and A. B. Bruce 1897: 525 are for inclusion. Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 137; Ellis 1974: 130; and Luce 1933: 173 omit it.

2 Wiefel 1988: 170 speaks of Jesus’ person and his mysterious suffering as the key to the unit. Schürmann 1969: 498 speaks of the mystery of God’s reign becoming evident to the disciples. Bovon 1989: 455 notes points of contact shared with Acts: (1) reception of power from the Lord (Acts 26:15–18), (2) the juxtaposition of preaching and healing (3:1–26), and (3) mission that finds acceptance and rejection (13:51; 18:6).

14 Fitzmyer 1981: 753–54; Ellis 1974: 137; m. Ber. 9.5 (a command with roots in Exod. 3:5); Schürmann 1969: 501 n. 20; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.4 §§124–27 (about the Essenes). On the contrast with the practice of Greek cynics and philosophers, see Schürmann 1969: 502 n. 24 and Bovon

1989: 458 n. 20, who compares the disciples' absence of possessions with the Levites and their being provided for through the tithe (Num. 18:21).

18 Relying on Mark 6:6 and suggesting that Luke 9:5 is influenced by 10:8–11, Bovon 1989: 459 and Schürmann 1969: 504 say that Jesus worked the cities and left the Twelve to train in the towns. But this argument is circular (what is 10:8–11 influenced by?), for the Matthean parallel mentions cities as well (10:5, 11 [probably], 14). It is better to regard the switch as intentional to show ministry in towns and cities. Jesus' woes in Luke 10:13–15 suggest that cities were involved in the mission.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 757 notes six Lucan modifications of Mark: (1) the Lucan use of the title τετραάρχης (tetrarch) (as in 3:1) versus the title βασιλεύς (king); (2) a reference to τὰ γινόμενα πάντα (all that has happened) instead of just to miracles; (3) a unique reference to Herod's perplexity; (4) the use of threefold ὅτι for the reports of popular speculation about Jesus; (5) the "who is this?" question; and (6) the note about a desire to see Jesus. Most see no sources here outside of Mark; Schürmann 1969: 508; Bovon 1989: 461–62; Schramm 1971: 128.

3 Schürmann 1969: 524 notes that the account is not a typical miracle account. There is no crowd reaction and no call for help.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

12 In late Judaism, Moses and Elijah are linked eschatologically in Deut. Rab. 3.17 on 10:1; SB 1:756; Schürmann 1969: 557.

9 Schürmann 1969: 100. R. Brown 1977: 549 allows this as a possibility. What he cannot accept is the reference to Quirinius. The Romans allowed the Jews to keep other customs: tax exemption every seventh year

(Josephus, Antiquities 14.10.6 §§202–10) and Sabbath observance (Antiquities 14.10.20 §§241–43).

2 Because the exact list of names is so uncertain and because Luke says nothing about the structure, one should be cautious about invoking such precise symbolism. Wiefel 1988: 97 seems to regard this twelfth-week view as possible. Schürmann 1969: 203 n. 119 argues that if it is present Luke is not conscious of it. Nolland 1989: 168 suggests that it was the point of Luke's source, whose order he reversed. But how can one know this? Goulder 1989: 284–85 is strongly supportive of this view, citing 1 Enoch 93.3–10 to stress that the form is to some extent artificial.

3 Schürmann 1969: 200; Fitzmyer 1981: 496; Ernst 1977: 155; Lohse, TDNT 8:486 n. 49. Bovon 1989: 189 calls attempts at harmonization excessive rationalization like that in current fundamentalism. C. F. Evans 1990: 252 calls the task "impossible," which is excessively skeptical.

1 Schürmann 1969: 527 notes that Luke shows evidence of knowing about the material in Mark, so that theories of a shorter or damaged copy of Mark cannot work.

7 Resseguie 1975 puts five of fourteen possible interpretations in this category. C. F. Evans 1990: 433 points out the lack of chronological notes, especially at the end of the section. Vague indications of time and place are provided only in the beginning of the section: 9:52, 56–57; 10:1, 21, 38; 11:14, 27; 13:10, 31; 14:1, 25. Schürmann 1994: 1 speaks of a metaphorical journey account in which Jesus goes his way to Jerusalem as an itinerant prophetic teacher who divides Israel. On Luke's use of journey and way terminology, see Schneider 1977a: 227.

30 Schweizer 1984: 176 notes that the force is spatial. Marshall 1978: 422 notes that in 11:20, which uses a different term, φθάνω, Luke clearly means "arrived." On the relationship between ἐγγίζω and φθάνω, see Fitzer, TDNT 9:89, esp. n. 10. Does 10:9 say the same thing as 11:20? It most likely does. Marshall does not think the spatial argument is as key as the argument of 11:20. For a full defense of the kingdom declared as arrived in this verse, see Bock 1992c. For the debate over the Aramaic behind the sayings and the difficulty of determining it, see Meier 1994: 432–34, 486–87. Luke's ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (upon you) is missing in the Matthean parallel and may represent his explanation of the sayings' force. The present effects of the kingdom are clearly in view (10:23–24; Nolland 1993a: 554). Schürmann 1994: 74 cites 7:28; 16:16; and 17:20–21 as conceptually parallel.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of "proem midrash" here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus' intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark's account and does not testify to a separate event.

11 There is debate about the age of these sections of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and, as a result, whether they reflect the Judaism of Jesus' period. Fitzmyer 1985: 879 questions their value, while Derrett 1970:

225 n. 5 holds that this uncertainty is insufficient to reject the presence of these ideas in this time. Nolland 1993a: 580–82 argues that the theme has Jewish roots, but that Jesus gives more focus to these two laws being the center of godliness. In Luke, the lawyer has such insight as well. Would the early church put such a reply in the lips of a Jewish lawyer? Nolland rightly rejects insistence on a Hellenistic background (against Schürmann 1994: 135, who speaks of piety toward God and righteousness toward others), but it must be noted that nowhere in Judaism do Deut. 6 and Lev. 19 appear explicitly side by side. See also the additional note.

30 Battle imagery with evil angels in the OT includes Isa. 24:22–23; in Judaism, T. Sim. 6.6 and T. Zeb. 9.8. Plummer 1896: 303; Danker 1988: 233; and Schürmann 1994: 243 see an allusion to Isa. 49:25–26. The battle imagery is similar, but the application to spiritual forces does not fit Isaiah's language in 49:26a, which clearly pictures humans. At best, Isaiah shows the principle involved. Such a move with imagery, however, is not surprising; see Luke 1:67–79 and Bock 1993. The point in the language for Luke is how Jesus, as God's representative, is God's victorious warrior.

6 Interestingly, Schürmann 1994: 334 divides the sayings into two categories: the voice of Jesus (11:39, 42a–b, 46a) and the voice of the early church (11:39b–41, 42c, 43, 44, 47–48, 49–51, 52). What the Jesus Seminar accepts (11:43), Schürmann rejects; while two of the verses that Schürmann accepts (11:42a, 46), the seminar rejects. The differences reflect just how much judgment and speculation goes into these assessments.

15 The NIV reads "give what is inside [the dish] to the poor," perhaps by analogy to the parallel rebuke of 11:39: you need to fix what is wrong in terms of greed by giving alms to the poor (so also Schürmann 1994: 312). This reading is probably wrong, since 11:39 looks at the need to clean the inside, not to give things from it. The main issue is not giving alms, which the Pharisees did, but how alms reflect spirituality. At best, the NIV sense is an implication of how greed is put aside. Alms should come from a pure heart. Regardless, the point is a commitment to a pure heart. In a sense, the Pharisees' complaint against Jesus reflects a failure to give such alms from the heart. They are quick to react against him.

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are "beyond recovery." This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

12 For a strongly reasoned defense of the shorter reading, refuting Schürmann, see B. Ehrman 1991. Ehrman underestimates, however, the significance of 1 Cor. 11:25–26 and underplays the substitution language in Acts 20:28—points that undermine his position. The 1 Corinthian parallel is telling because it raises the issue of where this detail came from if not from a tradition like that in Luke. It is unlikely that a scribe adding material would go outside the Gospels to do so, especially if the result produced harmonization problems.

15 Danker 1988: 345 and Jeremias 1966: 208–9 argue that in preparation for his coming suffering Jesus did not drink the wine. Schürmann 1952: 63–65, Plummer 1896: 495–96, and Marshall 1978: 798 argue that he did drink the wine.

18 The debate over the original wording of the tradition is complex and ultimately irresolvable, since it rests on so much speculation about what is likely. Marshall 1978: 804 and Schürmann 1955: 30–34, 123–28 argue for originality, Patsch 1972: 142–50 against it. Nolland 1993b: 1047 sees it as a later but quite accurate gloss, since Jesus looks to affirm his ongoing relationship to them despite his coming suffering.

6 While recognizing that the two accounts share some similarities, V. Taylor 1972: 61–64; Schürmann 1957: 63–99; Marshall 1978: 811; and Grundmann 1963: 400 note that Luke does not delay Marcan texts like this elsewhere.

24 The verb μωρανθῇ literally means for salt "to become foolish," a personification that shows its total lack of value because it is no longer salty; BAGD 531 §2; BAA 1075 §2. There may be a wordplay on the Semitic תפל (tpl), which can mean "to be foolish" or "to be unsavory"; Job 1:22; Jer. 23:13; Marshall 1978: 595; Black 1967: 166; Schwarz 1978. Nolland 1993a: 765 notes that the figure is based on the result of salt losing its saltiness, regardless of whether it actually happens.

42 Schwarz 1974 sees these commendatory remarks as ironic; they are really condemnatory. This interpretation is forced and is not a possible rendering of ἐπαινέω (to praise); BAGD 281; BAA 569 (elsewhere in the NT at Rom. 15:11; 1 Cor. 11:2, 17, 22 [twice]). Also failing is Bailey's attempt (1976: 107) to argue that ἐπαινέω has eschatological force in picturing approval at the judgment. Other than the use of praise in Matt. 25:21, 34, the Gospels do not have this eschatological force, and in this Matthean context the eschatological force is clear, not inferred as it would have to be here. Porter 1990: 146–47 recognizes that the term must be positive, for the steward is commended for choosing to associate with the sons of this age, a comment dripping with bitter irony from the master. If one is to argue the irony position, this is the best way to do it. Against it, however, is the comparison in 16:8–9, which makes the steward look like a positive example through the commendation, not a negative one.

19 Fitzmyer 1985: 1118 is against a decorative reference because such usage is found only in later rabbinic materials, not early Jewish documents. He also rejects the suggestion of Schwarz 1975 that κεραία refers to the Hebrew letter waw (ו). Regardless, the emphasis is on the whole of the law down to its smallest point. The law as a synthetic whole is in view here.

31 Schwarz 1979: 22 suggests a misreading of the Aramaic term for "end," but Fitzmyer 1985: 1433–34 rejects this view.

13 Fitzmyer 1981: 293; Marshall 1978: 41; Schweizer 1984: 11; Du Plessis 1974: 263–64; Sterling 1992: 334; L. Johnson 1991: 27. NIV and NKJV: "things that/which have been fulfilled." Einheitsübersetzung speaks of events that occurred among us and were fulfilled, combining the first and third meanings.

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life

65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

7 Schweizer 1984: 20. Herod's reaction in Matt. 2 seems to confirm that this is Herod's view, although the Josephus reference (Antiquities 14.9 §§156–84) cited by Schweizer appears not to make a Davidic point; rather, it highlights his regal self-awareness.

7 Schweizer 1984: 20. Herod's reaction in Matt. 2 seems to confirm that this is Herod's view, although the Josephus reference (Antiquities 14.9 §§156–84) cited by Schweizer appears not to make a Davidic point; rather, it highlights his regal self-awareness.

14 Schweizer 1984: 27–28; see the earlier discussion of Jewish engagement in this verse. On a possible Davidic tie through Mary, see 1:69.

42 Marshall 1978: 70–71; Schweizer 1984: 29; Wiefel 1988: 53; Schulz, TDNT 7:400; Schweizer, TDNT 6:405; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.33.6.

43 Fitzmyer 1981: 352 mentions Luke 2:23 and Isa. 4:3; Schweizer 1984: 30 adds Isa. 35:8; 62:12; Exod. 13:12; and Lev. 23:2 to show the variety of objects called "holy"; Schürmann 1969: 54 notes that 1 John 2:20 and Rev. 3:7 apply the description to Jesus.

25 SB 1:892; Schweizer 1984: 42; Plummer 1896: 41. One could argue that the figure means "for the sake of the fathers," but this rendering seems too soft in light of the belief that the righteous experience resurrection (16:19–31).

47 Apparently, Schweizer's view changed.

50 See discussions in Schürmann 1969: 94–95; Schweizer 1984: 44; R. Brown 1977: 376 n. 2; Bovon 1989: 110. Godet 1875: 1.118 refutes the older view that John was an Essene. The similarity between the two groups suggests that if John did not belong to one group, he probably was not a member of the other either.

29 Schweizer 1984: 57; Marshall 1978: 122. Jeremias in his earlier TDNT article, 4:271–72, 276–77, stresses that the dividing point is the presence or absence of faith.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n. 66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

5 Hendriksen 1978: 230 has a full discussion. He tends to emphasize a perceived priestly theme in Luke, but this is the point of the writer to the Hebrews and not a part of Lucan Christology at all (see Schweizer 1984: 81–82).

20 On δόξα, see BAGD 204 §2; BAA 410 §2; Schweizer 1984: 83; and Hendriksen 1978: 235–36 (who cites 2 Chron. 9:9–28; Eccles. 2:1–11; Rev. 18:12–13). Kittel, TDNT 2:237, suggests translating the term "radiance." The term alludes to the splendor and value of these kingdoms.

15 Schweizer 1984: 88 incorrectly says that all six Sabbath passages (4:16–30; 4:31–37; 6:1–5; 6:6–11; 13:10–17; 14:1–6) lead to dissension, but there is no mention of controversy in 4:31–37.

3 Godet 1875: 1.255 (who is not shy about seeing distinct events elsewhere); Liefeld 1984: 876. As already noted, Fitzmyer and Schweizer tie the account to John 21.

19 Schweizer 1984: 150 sees too much difference here when he argues that Luke leaves it up to the woman to come forward, while Mark has Jesus search for the woman.

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to "the" mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud's coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

2 Egelkraut 1976: 142, esp. n. 3, mentions the options. Schweizer 1984: 174 argues that Luke likes to split accounts from Q and Mark into distinct events (e.g., the Olivet Discourse in 17:22–37 ≈ 21:6–36 and Jesus' condemnation of the religious leadership in 11:37–54 ≈ 20:45–47). Fitzmyer 1985: 843, citing 22:35, argues that Luke created the mission in the split. For detailed discussion of texts where Mark and Q overlap, see Laufen 1980.

23 So child of Gehenna (Matt. 23:15), child of destruction (John 17:12), children of disobedience (Eph. 5:6), child of death (2 Sam. 12:5 LXX), children of wrath (Eph. 2:3). Schweizer, TDNT 8:365, calls this use of υἱός a term "of relationship," noting positively children of light (Luke 16:8) and children of resurrection (20:36).

30 Schweizer 1984: 176 notes that the force is spatial. Marshall 1978: 422 notes that in 11:20, which uses a different term, φθάνω, Luke clearly means "arrived." On the relationship between ἐγγίζω and φθάνω, see Fitzer, TDNT 9:89, esp. n. 10. Does 10:9 say the same thing as 11:20? It most likely does. Marshall does not think the spatial argument is as key as the argument of 11:20. For a full defense of the kingdom declared as arrived in this verse, see Bock 1992c. For the debate over the Aramaic behind the sayings and the difficulty of determining it, see Meier 1994: 432–34, 486–87. Luke's ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (upon you) is missing in the Matthean parallel and may represent his explanation of the sayings' force. The present effects of the kingdom are clearly in view (10:23–24; Nolland 1993a: 554). Schürmann 1994: 74 cites 7:28; 16:16; and 17:20–21 as conceptually parallel.

54 Such efforts, beginning with Harnack, regard this verse as too harsh a literary transition. This view appeals to the church fathers, who often cite the phrase and reverse the position of the Son and Father. Creed 1930: 147–48 rightly rejects such attempts because they are without strong external textual support; see also Schweizer, TDNT 8:372 n. 276. Marshall 1978: 435 notes that Marcion and codex N reverse the expression in Luke, while

Justin Martyr and codex N reverse it in Matthew; for more reversal passages in the fathers, see Grundmann 1963: 218 n. 16.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

12 So καὶ ἐγένετο (and it came to pass), ὡς (when), παύω (to cease), and καθώς (even as). Schweizer 1984: 190–91 sees the verse as Lucan, because Luke typically poses a question or notes an attitude at the beginning of a teaching of Jesus: 11:27, 45; 12:13, 41; 13:1–2, 23, 31; 14:15; 15:2; 16:14; 17:5, 20; 18:9; 19:11, 39; 22:24, 49; 23:27. Of these, only 17:5 is not uniquely Lucan, though the request to increase faith is unique. Luke 15:2 and 16:14 reflect complaints, while 11:27, 45; 12:13; 13:31; 14:15; 15:2; 16:14; 17:20; 18:9; 19:11, 39; 22:24; and 23:27 reflect statements, attitudes, or actions. Only four other verses are questions (12:41; 13:1–2, 23; 22:49). Nowhere is Jesus asked to instruct, only to explain or call to act. So the type of request is unusual. In addition, the presence of other features are less likely to be Lucan. For example, the reference to John is not necessary to set the scene. These unique features reduce the chance that Luke created the setting.

14 Ps. 14:1; 53:1 [53:2 MT]; 92:6 [92:7 MT]; 94:8; Prov. 6:12; Luke 12:20; Rom. 2:20; 1 Cor. 15:36; 2 Cor. 11:16, 19; 12:6, 11; SB 1:280; 2:102 (discusses Jewish warnings about having an arrogant heart, with Deut. 8:11–14 being the key text); Schweizer 1984: 199; Plummer 1896: 310; Bertram, TDNT 9:230–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 947. On the OT background, see Donald 1963.

2 Manson 1949: 270 (who argues that the connection to 12:1–12 is literary and that 12:13–21 is a self-contained unit inserted between two Q passages) and Schweizer 1984: 207. There is little evidence that Matthew knew of the parable and omitted it, despite what Marshall 1978: 522 suggests, citing Matt. 6:19–20, 25. Fitzmyer 1985: 968 correctly notes that Luke alone gives evidence of this account.

8 This stands in contrast to Prov. 11:26; Jer. 17:11; 1 Enoch 97.8–10. Sir. 11:18–19 is especially close to Jesus' picture, except that wealth comes through self-denial and diligence (lit., "from afflicting himself"), not simply fortune as in Luke. The LXX renders the key phrase "by his wariness and pinching," referring to frugality; Schweizer 1984: 207. Note also Ps. 49:16–20 [49:17–21 MT]; Plummer 1896: 323; Fitzmyer 1985: 972 (noting 1 Enoch 97.8–10, which rebukes unrighteous wealth); Nickelsburg 1978–79: 334–37. See n. 11 below for the Sirach and 1 Enoch texts.

17 So Schweizer 1984: 213 explains the reference to a steward and the use of the future tense in Luke. But a steward was a slave, as 12:43 makes clear, and the tense difference is not necessary to the point. If a stylistic preference exists, which is possible for the verb's tense, it has come in along with other differences that are more difficult to explain. For example, of the uses of καθίστημι (to appoint, put in charge) in Matt. 24:45, 47; 25:21, 23, only the first is aorist, and all are in an eschatological setting.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

4 On women and the synagogue, see Safrai 1976c: 919–20; m. Ber. 3.3. Midr. ha-Gadol on Deut. 29:10 [29:11 MT] pictures women and children receiving teaching by hearing the readings of the Targums. Safrai notes that these late rabbinic texts are confirmed by Acts 16:13 and 17:4. Schweizer 1984: 222 is thus wrong to suggest that the woman is outside the synagogue.

1 Schweizer 1984: 225–26, though noting links to Matthew, suggests that the tradition may have come together before Luke, because of non-Lucan language in 13:25–27. Luce 1933: 240 sees too little correspondence to attribute the material to Q, as does Grundmann 1963: 284, who speaks of a special Lucan source. Michaelis, TDNT 5:71, argues for distinct traditions of the image of the open door.

4 Such introductions to teaching are common in Luke: 11:27, 45; 12:13, 41; 13:1, 23; 15:2; 16:14; 17:5, 20; 18:9; 19:11, 39; 22:24, 49; 23:27; Schweizer 1984: 191. Almost all of the examples are in the journey-to-Jerusalem section, so that the style is not uniform throughout the Gospel.

13 But so Schweizer 1984: 238, who regards this as Jew-Gentile distinction; but that distinction is not in this group. The Gentiles may be in the set of invitations in 14:23.

12 In Prov. 24:3–6, wisdom builds a house and wages war; Schweizer 1984: 241; Tiede 1988: 270–71.

21 Schweizer's point is that not everyone is forced to give away their possessions or be rejected by family as a result of coming to Jesus, but they need to be prepared to do so.

22 Berger 1972: 209–26 argues that the law refers to the "will of God." Schweizer 1984: 258 says the law is newly interpreted by Jesus' kingdom preaching and is valid as a moral norm (at least in some of its elements). Plummer 1896: 389 and Arndt 1956: 361 see a distinction between moral law and defunct ceremonial law.

35 For example, many psalms testify to the great work of the exodus and the accompanying unbelief (e.g., Ps. 78). Schweizer 1984: 261 notes that the raising of Lazarus in John 11:43–53 failed to stop opposition to Jesus.

23 "Going on strike" before God is not an option for a believer; Schweizer 1984: 264.

5 Though not accepting this view, Schweizer 1984: 272 notes a rabbinic tradition that if two Sabbaths were perfectly observed the kingdom would come, citing Isa. 56:4–7; b. Šab. 118b; SB 1:600 §B. Against this view is the late tractate Derek ʾereṣ Rabbah 11.13 (= A. Cohen 1965: 2.565), which cites Rabbi Jose as saying, "Whoever calculates the end has no portion in the future world." This fits the later rabbis' tendency to discourage apocalyptic speculation.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

3 Bultmann 1963: 33–34 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1219 take 19:8 as a Lucan addition, breaking the flow of the story. Marshall 1978: 695 agrees with Bultmann that 19:10 may be a later comment, but Fitzmyer sees it as part of the account. Schweizer 1984: 290 regards 19:8 as a non-Lucan addition to the story, while Luke is responsible for 19:10. Those who see Luke adding 19:10 often suggest that it is his version of the famous ransom saying of Mark 10:45.

7 Marshall 1978: 147; Scobie 1964: 73 n. 1. As Nolland 1989: 152 says, the argument "proves too much." Acts 19 shows people whose tie to Spirit hope is remote, not intimate.

5 Kissinger 1979 overviews recent discussion and gives full bibliographies up to 1977. Blomberg 1990 and B. Scott 1989 update the discussion. Scott attempts a more literary reading of the parables and sees them as a development of the OT מָשָׁל (māšāl). His analyses of structure are often helpful, his handling of historical matters less so.

17 B. Scott's treatment (1989: 190–202) underplays the twist and argues that the Jewish hearer could not identify with the Samaritan because of cultural prejudice. But this is exactly what Jesus challenges the lawyer (and the hearer of the parable) to do and see: be a neighbor and do so without prejudice. Scott's effort to see 10:37 as Lucan on the basis of parallels and because of a shift of meaning for "neighbor" ignores Jesus' penchant for redirecting thinking and playing with meaning (e.g., 5:24; 20:41–44; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

1 Blomberg 1990: 267 states the points of the unit: (1) purely selfish accumulation of possessions is incompatible with true discipleship, and (2) this incompatibility stems from the transience of earthly riches and the coming reckoning that all will face before God. B. Scott 1989: 128 notes the parallelism between Luke 12 and 16, with their common themes of threats from hell, riches, and the issue of stewardship.

3 The Gospel of Thomas 63, 72 has parallel material, but §63 is not primary, as B. Scott 1989: 130–31 correctly argues. However, Scott wrongly asserts that the separation of the question and the parable in the Gospel of Thomas shows that Luke put these two elements together (with Scott, Funk and Hoover 1993: 338 argue that 12:15 was written by Luke, printing it in black type). The Gospel of Thomas lacks any warning, and so is only conceptually parallel. In addition, the general nature of the Gospel of Thomas is to work with only one short saying at a time.

7 Tiede 1988: 233; Ernst 1977: 398; Fitzmyer 1985: 970; Lev. 19:18. Manson 1949: 271 notes the similar OT perspective: Job 31:24–25; Ps. 49; Eccles. 2:1–11. Note also T. Judah 18–19; Sir. 11:18–19; 1 Enoch 97.8–10;

Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14; B. Scott 1989: 131–32.

9 B. Scott 1989: 135 notes that the rich man takes over the narration from the narrator, showing the theme of autonomy.

10 B. Scott 1989: 135–36, esp. n. 26, compares this attitude to the Epicurean philosophy reflected in the inscription on Sardanapalus's tomb (recorded by Plutarch, Moralia 336c ["On the Fortune of Alexander" 2.3]): "Eat, drink, and sport with love; all else is nothing."

8 Scott makes much of the issue that a mustard tree is a shrub and yet yields cedar tree–like qualities in the parable. This "twist" may add a miraculous note to the image, though Scott believes (based on m. Kil. 3.2) its resultant force is an allusion to uncleanness (reflected in the sowing of mustard seed in a garden). If this idea is present, it is subtle. Only Luke's form, with its garden reference, could sustain the point. The point more likely addresses only the unusual nature of the growth, not ritual uncleanness, a theme that Jesus tended not to address in reference to the kingdom.

13 Stählin, TDNT 9:160, also n. 117, exaggerates the ancient debate: some ancients (Plato, Phaerdus 233d–34a) said to invite only family and friends, while m. ›Abot 1.5 said to leave the door wide open (but for reasons of exclusion noted above). B. Scott 1989: 164 calls Jesus' instruction the "law of no return."

3 For unity are Marshall 1978: 633–34 and Grobel 1963–64. Bultmann 1963: 178 denies unity (although he says that Luke received a unified story), wrongly assuming that a parable can only have one point. Crossan

1973: 66–67 and B. Scott 1989: 142–46 argue that 16:19–26 go back to Jesus and 16:27–31 to the early church, citing conceptual ties to Luke 24. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 360–62) makes a similar break, printing 16:19–26 in gray type (arguing that its roots may go back to Jesus) and 16:27–31 in black type (arguing that these verses were added later and are inauthentic). For refutation, see Pilgrim 1981: 114–15 and Hock 1987: 454–55.

8 Bultmann 1963: 178 calls the account a similitude, which is where he puts parables and such. Berger 1984: 51 sees it as a parable. Ernst 1977: 472 rightly compares it to 15:11–32 and 16:1–8. Hauck, TDNT 5:752, calls it an illustrative story and compares it to 10:30–37; 12:16–21; and 18:9–14. For the structure, see B. Scott 1989: 146–48.

11 For discussion of the name Lazarus, see Dunkerley 1958–59; Derrett 1970: 78–99; Cave 1968–69; B. Scott 1989: 149 n. 28; SB 2:223; Meier 1994: 825, 868 n. 158.

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

3 Grundmann 1963: 345 sees a saying about persistence in prayer appended to a parable like 11:5–13; esp. B. Scott 1989: 177–78. The Jesus Seminar argues that the themes of prayer and the returning Son of Man are Lucan. But a connection to the parable sources shows that prayer has traditional roots and the concept of the “elect” is only in Luke here. It is not a Lucan expression.

7 This point makes it unlikely that the judge was a Gentile, but so Plummer 1896: 411 and C. A. Evans 1990: 269. On the historical background, see B. Scott 1989: 184, citing Chajes 1892, who notes that most cases were heard by one judge (though he uses late texts).

22 B. Scott 1989: 232–35 (interacting with McGaughy 1975) appears to see a contrast between Jews and Pharisees, who "freeze" under fear of God by too narrowly preserving the law. There are several problems with this interpretation: (1) it reads the parable too existentially, (2) law is nowhere found in the context, and (3) the leadership is in view in 19:27.

3 B. Scott 1989: 245–48 is unique in arguing that all the versions, even Thomas, are derived. His quest for the original form assumes that the shortest form is the more original, but to get there he strips the parable of its fundamental salvation-historical sense, which ignores the OT imagery too much.

24 So E. Scott 1911; J. Campbell 1936–37; Clark 1940. Ἐγγίζω means "arrives soon" in Mark 14:42.

26 So E. Scott 1924: 91 (cf. Luce 1933: 272): "[Luke] was plainly a man of tender and generous sentiment, who in his warm sympathy for the poor had come to idealize poverty. It need not be doubted that the sayings which he attributes to Jesus are genuine; but he is at pains to put this side of the teaching into the forefront.… The original meaning of the parable may have been little more than that earthly positions will be reversed in the coming age. But the rich man's fate is so presented that he seems to be punished simply because he is rich, while Lazarus is rewarded for his poverty. This false and puerile lesson cannot be that which Jesus intended." Scott reads the parable too much in isolation from Jesus' other teachings and fails to see that material possessions are not the point; the use of them is.

20 Seeberg 1914: 11–12. In an exhaustive study of the problem, Carmignac 1969: 122–28 notes that "necessary" and "for the future day" were the most popular ancient options.

16 Schürmann 1969: 248 n. 195. Seesemann, TDNT 5:117–18, rightly calls it a "defensive formula," not a confession.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

28 On the general nature of the remarks, see Seesemann, TDNT 5:173. Others have suggested specific groups: (1) church leaders and laity, (2) scribes and Jewish people, (3) Jews and Gentiles, and (4) believers and unbelievers. See Marshall 1978: 544 for a discussion of the first three options and Kistemaker 1980: 127 for the final option. It is too early for a direct reference to the church; so view 1 is unlikely (though the church is the audience to whom Luke applies the parable). There are no Gentiles in the audience, so view 3 is unlikely. A reference to scribes and Jewish people leaves out the most obvious group to be alluded to, that is, the disciples, so view 2 is not adequate either. Against a simple division into believers and unbelievers is the difference in tone between 12:46 and 12:47–48. Probably in view in 12:46 are those like Judas and those like the Jewish leadership who wait for the kingdom but ignore the master and beat his servants. The parable is relevant to Israelites because they perceive themselves as heirs of the kingdom. In addition, though they reject the idea, Jesus came as their king. His remarks show that they defaulted on their role by failing to serve.

11 Matt. 25:10–13 is conceptually parallel. The image of not knowing "where one is from" comes from the OT: Ps. 138:6; Isa. 63:16; Jer. 1:5; Hos. 5:3; 13:5; Amos 3:2; cf. 2 Tim. 2:19. Seesemann, TDNT 5:117, notes that in later Judaism the expression meant excommunication or total rejection.

8 The phrase enter into temptation occurred earlier in 8:13; 11:4; Ellis 1974: 257. On the conceptual similarity to 1 Pet. 5:8, see Seesemann, TDNT 6:31–32. On the temptation as entry into serious eschatological battle with Satan, see R. Brown 1994: 159–61, who ties the remark to Luke 11:4. Jesus must prepare for his great face-off with Satan.

38 The OT has the call to love the neighbor in Lev. 19:18, but Judaism debated who the neighbor was, as Luke 10:25–37 shows. Bovon 1989: 313 n. 21 cites Seitz 1969–70: 47: "Loving is thus a matter of 'doing mercy,' which is to stop at no frontiers, levelling all barriers erected by national and even religious hostility." The call to love has no racial, national, social, and religious barriers. The disciple is to love all people. The implications of this are far-reaching in any culture in which disciples find themselves.

4 For potential wisdom tradition in the parable's background and how the parable fits Jesus' teaching, see Seng 1978: 154–55, who is more circumspect on proving authenticity. The term in 12:15 for greed, πλεονεξία, is rare in the Gospels (only here and Mark 7:22), so it is unlikely to be an early church term put into Jesus' mouth. In fact, the word group is basically Pauline (fifteen of nineteen uses).

3 Reicke 1968: 228–34. On these distinctions, see Sherwin-White 1963: 1–23 (who cites a variety of relevant ancient texts); C. F. Evans 1990: 233; Tacitus, Annals 15.25.

6 Sherwin-White 1963: 12 n. 4. Tacitus, Annals 12.60, is the ancient source that discusses the key terminology.

13 Hoehner 1977: 16–17 cites Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.4 §319 and Jewish War 2.6.3 §96. Hayles 1974: 25–26 posits deteriorating relations between Augustus and Herod as an explanation for the census. The statement by Sherwin-White 1963: 163 n. 4 that such a census in this period is impossible is clearly excessive in light of our partial knowledge of this period.

16 Sherwin-White 1963: 162–71. This conclusion emerges from combining various historical sources, among which Josephus is very important.

16 Besides those already cited, other major works on Jesus' trial are Bammel 1970, Blinzler 1969, Sherwin-White 1963: 24–47, and Winter 1974. Catchpole, Blinzler, and Sherwin-White defend the historicity of much of the Lucan account. Fitzmyer 1985: 1466 also thinks a morning trial is most likely.

5 Παιδεύω here refers to flogging; BAGD 604 §2bγ; BAA 1222 §2bγ; elsewhere in the NT with this meaning only at Luke 23:22; cf. 1 Kings 12:11, 14; 2 Chron. 10:11, 14. Mark 15:15 uses φραγελλώσας for the whipping before the crucifixion. Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28 distinguishes three types of flogging: fustes, flagella, and verbera. He may be right that Luke refers to fustigatio in terms of Pilate's initial intention, but when he gave Jesus over, the verberatio would be administered for crucifixion. R. Brown 1994: 851 questions the value of these distinctions and whether Luke's audience would know them. Regardless, the punishment came with the crucifixion.

19 Godet 1875: 2.64 notes that W. M. L. de Wette and H. A. W. Meyer held this view in the nineteenth century. Shirock 1992 now ably defends this view, noting that it was the view of Chrysostom, Homilies on Matthew 41 (on Matt. 12:25–26). He gives six reasons for the view, the most compelling of which I note on p. 1078. If this view is correct, a major reason for separating 11:19 from 11:20 in the original tradition—namely, the difference in meaning of "you" in each verse—disappears. Evidence of the presence God's kingdom is seen in Jesus and his followers. If this is the argument, Jesus is noting evidence of God's grace in Israel!

46 The English translations by H. T. Andrews (in Charles 1913: 2.113) and Hadas 1951: 180–81 correctly look like the Golden Rule, while that by R. J. H. Shutt (in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 2.26) does not.

8 R. J. H. Shutt's translation of Aristeas (in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 2.20) says that each settler had 100 acres, based on 600,000 settlers on 60,000,000 acres or arourae. But this figure is too high, since one aroura is 0.275 hectare or about two-thirds of an acre. One hundred arourae is thus around 70 acres.

14 O. Betz, TDNT 9:288–90, 298. Some cite Tg. Song 2:12; SB 1:123–24, but Sjöberg, TDNT 6:382, notes that the Spirit never appears in the form of a dove in rabbinic writings.

33 On Jewish views of forgiveness of sin, see Nolland 1989: 236, who notes key studies: Sjö;berg 1938; Thyen 1970; Gradwohl 1974; and Klauck 1981.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

20 Sloan 1977: 39–41; Rese 1969: 219. Isa. 58 has Sabbath imagery, while Isa. 61 has Jubilee imagery.

23 Sloan 1977: 38–41. One could also suggest that the Isa. 58 connection was made to underline the very type of ministry that Jesus did exhibit on the Sabbath. His activity fulfilled expectation in line with the general ethical call of Isa. 58:1–13, esp. v. 13, where the Sabbath theme appears; see Carroll R. 1992.

30 Sloan 1977: 33–36. Grundmann, TDNT 2:59, sees a clear messianic allusion (Isa. 49:8–11; 58:6–8), though what the Isaiah texts show is the presence of decisive deliverance more than a direct allusion to Messiah.

ἐνιαυτός recalls not only Isa. 61:2, but also Lev. 25:10, which teaches Jubilee.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

34 BAGD 883, BAA 1762, and esp. Fitzmyer 1985: 853 discusses the uncertainty about Chorazin's exact location: either two to three miles north of Capernaum at Khirbet Karazeh (R. W. Smith in ABD 1:912) or a site on Lake Gennesaret. Wiefel 1988: 198–99 prefers the location near Capernaum, as does Manson 1949: 77. Manson also notes that Bethsaida is on the east side of the Jordan near its entry into the Sea of Galilee, about five miles from Capernaum.

11 Creed 1930: 218–19; Sneed 1962; Dalman 1909: 145–47; Dodd 1961: 62–63 (who later switched to view 2). See Mattill 1979: 193 and Beasley-Murray 1986: 101 for details on the Gospel of Thomas, Origen, Chrysostom, Athanasius, Ambrose, Jerome, and Luther.

16 Snodgrass 1980 analyzes the use of this text in the OT, LXX, Targums, Dead Sea Scrolls, Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, and rabbinic literature. In the Jewish view, it often looked to end-time salvation.

1 On allegorical parables, see Derrett 1974; Blomberg 1982a: 6–8; Carlston 1981; and Klauck 1978. On the parable's interpretive history, see

Snodgrass 1983: 3–11, who defends authenticity (pp. 2, 87, 103–4, 108, 112). Giblin 1985: 65–66 does not see allegory as a distinct genre of parables, but speaks of the parable's allegorical bent. See also excursus 8, where parable and allegory are seen as part of a literary continuum.

4 Luce 1933: 308 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1279 present the case for nonauthenticity without endorsing it. Snodgrass 1983: 106–10 has a detailed defense of the authenticity of this parable. He concludes: "If one rejects the dominical origin of this parable, he or she does so because of presuppositions about the nature of the Gospels . . . and not because of any element in the parable itself."

2 For excellent overviews of the variety of positions on Lucan redaction, see Soards 1987: 13–16 and V. Taylor 1972: 3–27. Nolland 1993b: 1023 is convinced that Luke had a second source, which he thinks may be a continuous account.

3 Soards 1987: 13–16 notes a third position: that Luke composed the material, by which he means that Luke is responsible for some additional material.

8 Soards 1987: 49 and J. Green 1988: 231–33 argue that Luke used traditional material to which John also had access.

2 Fitzmyer and Marshall are undecided about the tradition-historical issue. For more on this topic, see Schürmann's three studies (1952, 1955, 1957), Soards 1987, and J. Green 1988. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 387–88) reflects excessive skepticism, printing the dialogue of 22:15–22 in black type because of the differences in wording and the presence of two cups. The seminar believes that there was a meal with symbolic acts, but the exact words are “beyond recovery.” This contrastive approach amazingly excludes the likely possibility of an accurate summary of such an emotive event.

4 Ὥρα (hour) occurs many times in the passion narrative, including Mark 14:35, 41; John 12:23; 13:1; 17:1; Luke 22:53. Because ὥρα carries no qualifiers (as in 22:53), it conveys no special sense of God’s hour (against Grundmann 1963: 392 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1384; as noted by Marshall 1978: 794 and especially Soards 1987: 33).

24 Marshall 1978: 823 notes that the vocabulary is Lucan, but that a redaction of Mark is not evident. Soards 1987: 39 overstates a detail here and argues that the Lucan Peter states his readiness before the prediction of his threefold denial, while the Marcan Peter says it is after the prediction. But the initial prediction in Mark and Matthew is of sheep scattered, not of the threefold denial. In addition, Peter has two refutations of Jesus’ predictions, which serve as a bracket (Matt. 26:33, 35 = Mark 14:29, 31). Luke has only one remark (22:33), which comes first. A summary in Luke is evident, but a source cannot be excluded, since Luke 22:33 does not match the vocabulary of Matthew or Mark.

27 Soards argues that the passage creates a setting for understanding what happens in 22:49–51 and 23:32. But why not then see these elements as part of a source that referred to these unique details rather than see it as Luke’s creation, especially given the numerous points in this section that hint at another source?

4 Soards 1987: 96 mentions 22:39a–b, 40b, 42 as the minimum (he excludes 22:43–44 on textual grounds). Ernst 1977: 607 and Goulder 1989:

741–42 make the best case for additional sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 329 rejects the originality of 22:43–44. For discussion of how the prayer's contents could be known when the disciples are some distance away and asleep, see R. Brown 1994: 174. The Jesus Seminar rejects the historicity of the material on the premise that no one heard the prayer (Funk and Hoover 1993: 391). Brown calls such an objection to historicity a "low level" approach and suggests that the disciples need not have been asleep at this point, although later he suggests that they did not need to hear the prayer because they knew how Jesus prayed. Either explanation is possible. Brown regards the prayer and the event as certain (p. 234), but is less confident of knowledge of the exact words (p. 225). I prefer the view that the event drove the meaning and form of the tradition.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

17 For a study of the hermeneutic of Luke's OT use, see Bock 1987, in which I build on P. Schubert's 1957 thesis that Luke's theme is "proof from prophecy" (but the apologetic motif is not so strong in Luke as the declarative function of these texts, thus my modification to "proclamation from prophecy and pattern"). My work contrasts with that of Rese 1969, who underestimates the appeal to pattern and therefore understates a prophetic approach to Luke's OT. Soards 1994: 201 misconstrues the proof-from-prophecy position by describing it as linear, which does not reflect my view of the interaction between text and event in the proclamation-from-prophecy-and-pattern theme; see Bock 1987: 273.

22 On Luke's love of triads, see Delling, TDNT 8:223–24, esp. n. 58; also Sparks 1936. Of sixty-four such groupings in the NT, seventeen are peculiar to Luke. The note in TDNT argues that the technique goes back to Jesus.

18 So also Godet in the third French edition of his commentary, but not in the English translations of his earlier French editions (see Cortés and Gatti 1987: 255 n. 27). Lexical support for this sense comes from the LXX (Gen. 33:11; Judg. 13:15–16; 19:7; 2 Sam. 13:25, 27; 2 Kings 5:23 [variant reading]), the related verb παραβιάζομαι (to urge insistently; Luke 24:29; Acts 16:15), and Koine sources (MM 109–10 and Spicq 1995: 1.290–91).

22 Exod. 4:24. The meaning "dining room" is found in 1 Sam. 1:18 and Sir. 14:25; BAGD 414; BAA 841; Schürmann 1969: 105; Stählin, TDNT 5:19–20 nn. 136, 143.

27 In the NT, θρηνέω (to mourn) occurs elsewhere at Matt. 11:17; Luke 23:27; John 16:20; Stählin, TDNT 3:152–54; αὐλέω (to play an instrument) at Matt. 11:17; 1 Cor. 14:7; ὀρχέομαι (to dance) at Matt. 11:17; 14:6; Mark 6:22; and κλαίω (to cry), among others, at Mark 5:38–39; Luke 7:13; 8:52.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

34 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327; Michel, TDNT 8:104. On Jesus and table fellowship, see Stählin, TDNT 9:161.

46 Other NT uses are Titus 3:3; James 4:1, 3; 2 Pet. 2:13. Mark has the synonymous ἐπιθυμία; Stählin, TDNT 2:924–25; Büchsel, TDNT 3:171 n.

36. Bovon 1989: 410–11 suggests that Luke made the change, because Mark's term can be read positively by a Greek.

35 Matthew has ἐγένοντο, Luke ἐγενήθησαν. Stählin, TDNT 7:61–62, makes too much of this difference.

19 See Stählin, TDNT 8:263 and n. 26, for ancient examples of the poor treatment of servants. Stählin calls the beating a "base abuse of power," but it was common.

29 On αἰτέω meaning much is "asked" ethically of someone, see Stählin, TDNT 1:191. In the financial realm, the term can indicate the "payment asked" by someone (on the similar use of ζητέω [to seek], see Greeven, TDNT 2:892 §1). A similar commercial term is παρατίθημι (to commit or deposit) (Maurer, TDNT 8:163). The verse emphasizes ethical responsibility and uses imagery that compares such responsibility to fiscal responsibility.

5 Luke 5:15; 8:2; 11:14; 13:12; Matt. 8:17. Demonic influence may be a better description than demonic possession, because it is not behavior but a diseased condition that is the point; Luke 4:33, 38–39; 2 Cor. 12:7. Weakness is produced by the evil spirit; 1QapGen 20.17, 21–29; Stählin, TDNT 1:493; Marshall 1978: 557. Fitzmyer 1985: 1012 calls the genitival ἀσθενείας (weakness) an Aramaism; see Creed 1930: 183. Nolland 1993a: 724 suggests that the number eighteen may be conventional (2 x 9 = "a long time"); Judg. 3:13–14; 10:8; 20:25, 44; 2 Sam. 8:13. This is possible, but not certain.

13 Stählin, TDNT 9:160, also n. 117, exaggerates the ancient debate: some ancients (Plato, Phaerdus 233d–34a) said to invite only family and friends, while m. ʾAbot 1.5 said to leave the door wide open (but for reasons of exclusion noted above). B. Scott 1989: 164 calls Jesus' instruction the "law of no return."

7 Σκάνδαλον is used of the wicked in Josh. 23:13; Judg. 2:3; 1 Sam. 18:21; Ps. 68:23 LXX [69:22 Engl.]; of idols in Ps. 105:36 LXX [106:36 Engl.]; of the arrogant in Ps. 139:6 LXX [140:5 Engl.]; and of evildoers in Ps. 140:9 LXX [141:9 Engl.]. See also Wis. 14:11; Ps. Sol. 16.7. In the NT, σκάνδαλον is used of false teaching (Rom. 16:17) and of action that causes others to sin (Rom. 14:13). Stählin, TDNT 7:351, sees the σκάνδαλον causing the loss of faith; that is, it is a serious sin that leads to defection. Matt. 11:6 declares the blessing of the one who is not "scandalized," who is able to confess Jesus. The term refers to placing an obstacle in someone's way and thus, in this context, of enticing them to proceed in a wrong direction.

2 Κατάλυμα is a private house, but in Luke 2:7 it refers to the inn where Jesus was born; elsewhere in the NT only at the parallel Mark 14:14; also 1 Sam. 1:18 [no MT equivalent]; 9:22; Sir. 14:25; BAGD 414; BAA 841; Büchsel, TDNT 4:338; Stählin, TDNT 5:19 n. 136.

3 Stählin, TDNT 9:138, 140–41, notes that the kiss was probably seen as a disciple's greeting for his teacher. A simple custom has been transformed into a sign of betrayal. Marshall 1978: 835 notes "misused kisses" in Scripture (Gen. 27:26–27; 2 Sam. 15:5; Prov. 7:13; 27:6; esp. 2 Sam. 20:9) and Judaism (Sir. 29:5).

13 Stählin (TDNT 8:264–65) speaks of a game like "blind man's bluff." R. Brown 1994: 575 discusses three games involving covered or blindfolded eyes listed by Pollux, Onomasticon 9.113, 123, 129 (second century b.c.).

2 Stählin, TDNT 3:152–53, thinks that θρηνέω indicates “freewill” wailing, not professional mourners. Determining this force for the term is not, of course, merely a matter of the words used but of the historical, literary context.

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (gā‹ar, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (gĕ‹ar, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT]; 106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

8 On the term θεοῦ (of God) as tightly binding Jesus and God, see Stauffer, TDNT 3:104 n. 261; Mark 1:24; John 1:29; 6:33, 69; Luke 23:35; 2 Cor. 4:4. Grundmann, TDNT 9:532, calls it a genitive of authorship: Jesus is the Christ sent from God. The expression τὸν χριστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ is unique to Luke.

53 On the idea of total authority in παραδίδωμι (to give over), see Büchsel, TDNT 2:171; Matt. 11:27; 28:18 (δίδωμι); 1 Cor. 15:24; Exod. Rab. 15.30 on 12:2. Stauffer, TDNT 2:348, calls this passage the “cry of jubilation.”

19 For βοάω (to cry out), see BAGD 144; BAA 288 §1d; Stauffer, TDNT 1:625–26; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 3:3 = Mark 1:3 = Luke 3:4 = John 1:23; Mark 15:34 (= Matt. 27:46 [ἀναβοάω]); Luke 9:38; 18:7, 38; Acts 8:7; 17:6; 25:24; Gal. 4:27. In the LXX at Gen. 4:10; Judg. 10:10 (B); Num. 20:16 (ἀναβοάω). Rev. 6:9–11 is conceptually similar.

18 C. Turner 1925–26: 113–25; Glickman 1983: 86–87. Stegner 1989: 15–31 stresses this Genesis connection over the regal motifs, tying ἀγαπητός to the Jewish motifs of the binding of Isaac. Currently, this may well be the most popular explanation. Gen. 22:2 is also mentioned as having the same basic phrase, though the expression there is in the accusative case. Other LXX uses of this phrase occur in Jer. 6:26; Amos 8:10; and Zech. 12:10.

4 For evaluation of this issue, see the introduction to the Gospel of Luke under “Sources” and excursus 4. See also McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987.

2 See, e.g., the treatments of Creed 1930: lvi–lxx; Klostermann 1929: 49; Fitzmyer 1981: 75–81. Detailed studies are Schulz 1972; Polag 1982; Kloppenborg 1988; and Kloppenborg 1987. A commentary on Q is Manson 1949. On the rationale for Q, see Stein 1987. These analyses differ in detail and approach, but all agree that an independent source or set of sources is involved.

4 Fitzmyer gives four reasons why this view cannot work: (1) it cannot explain the presence of Moses and Elijah; (2) the verb ὁράω (to see; passive = to appear) is not limited to postresurrection events; (3) Jesus' glory is never mentioned in a resurrection account; and (4) the form does not match resurrection appearances. See also Bock 1987: 324 n. 98; H. Müller 1960: 60; Stein 1976.

1 For solid overviews of this area, see McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987. McKnight is slightly more confident than I am of Marcan priority, though I still regard it likely that Mark was the first Gospel written. Still, his and Stein's overviews show why many think Mark's Gospel is first. For a comparative study of the two major options in the debate, see Bellinzoni, Tyson, and Walker 1985 and Dungan 1990. A study making significant points about Q and the complex interrelationship of the Gospel writers is Reicke 1986. For the case for Matthean priority, see Farmer 1964.

7 Stein 1992: 339 n. 83 notes five cases of likely Lucan omission.

4 The Gospel of Peter 9.35–10.42 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.224–25) gives details about the resurrection, an expansion that demonstrates the differences between canonical and noncanonical accounts and indicates what happened to the tradition in the postapostolic period; cf. also Barn. 15.9. The glorified body is not a mere return to the former earthly existence (i.e., like the resurrection of Lazarus), but represents a transcendent form of real existence (1 Cor. 15:35–49, esp. 15:42–44). On the resurrection as event, see Stein 1977 and Craig 1980.

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta

Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

11 Later Jewish tradition shows a connection between the eschaton and healing: Pesikta Rabbati 15.22 (= Braude 1968: 336–37), where Isa. 35:5–6 is used; Aggadat Bereshit 69.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); possibly 1QH 18.14–15.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

15 SB 1:635 cites Derek› ereṣ Zuṭṭa 5 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 251): “A house in which there is disunity will assuredly be destroyed at the last.”

3 On “God-fearers,” see the discussion below on Luke’s audience. For more details of the recent discussion, see Sterling 1992: 328. However, I reject Sterling’s proposal (p. 326) that the author of Luke–Acts was not Luke but only interviewed him and used him as a source for Acts 13–28. One must explain why tradition names only Luke as the author.

6 For a defense of the unity of Luke–Acts and the prologue as serving both volumes, see Maddox 1982: 4–6. Sterling 1992: 341–45 is balanced, arguing that whatever criticism is present is “subdued.”

13 Fitzmyer 1981: 293; Marshall 1978: 41; Schweizer 1984: 11; Du Plessis 1974: 263–64; Sterling 1992: 334; L. Johnson 1991: 27. NIV and NKJV: “things that/which have been fulfilled.” Einheitsübersetzung speaks of events that occurred among us and were fulfilled, combining the first and third meanings.

24 Michel, TDNT 8:94–105; M. Stern 1974: 330–34; Donahue 1971; Fitzmyer 1981: 469–70; Badian 1972. E. Sanders 1992: 146–69 notes that the tax system in Palestine was not more oppressive than in other regions. He estimates that taxes consumed somewhere between 20 percent and 30 percent of one’s income. For a more skeptical view that sees toll collectors as a symbolic representation of Jesus’ outreach to archetypal sinners, see Neale 1991: 110–15. I regard Neale’s dichotomy between symbolic representation and history as false for reasons made clear below. In this approach Neale follows Horsley 1987, and both underestimate the connections between John and Jesus in terms of audience. See also 5:29–32.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

11 Later Jewish tradition shows a connection between the eschaton and healing: Pesikta Rabbati 15.22 (= Braude 1968: 336–37), where Isa. 35:5–6 is used; Aggadat Bereshit 69.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); possibly 1QH 18.14–15.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels.

The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Ta‹an. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

15 SB 1:635 cites Derek›ereṣ Zuṭṭa 5 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 251): “A house in which there is disunity will assuredly be destroyed at the last.”

65 Num. 8:22; 16:9; 18:4; 2 Chron. 31:2; also Heb. 8:6; 9:21; Plummer 1896: 18; Fitzmyer 1981: 329; Strathmann, TDNT 4:219–22, 227.

13 Klostermann 1929: 13. A reference to “her name” or “whose name” following the mention of the Davidic house would have made a Davidic reference to Mary clear; Strathmann, TDNT 4:238.

1 Wiefel 1988: 68–70 gives some background on Caesar Augustus. For an evaluation of the Lucan notes that place Luke within the sphere of ancient history writing, see Büchsel, TDNT 3:395–96, and Strathmann, TDNT 4:492 n. 53.

7 Matthew never mentions Levi, while Mark 2:14, agreeing with Luke, calls this man Levi. Mark 2:14 gives the fullest name, calling him Levi son of Alphaeus. James son of Alphaeus is listed with the Twelve in Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13 (see the exegesis of 6:15). In addition, Mark’s list of the Twelve has Matthew, not Levi. These factors have produced the discussion. Strathmann, TDNT 4:234, calls Mark’s description of the name more accurate, but it is unclear why this contrast to the other Synoptics is necessary. What is present are alternative names for the same person. Mark simply has more detail.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

17 Strathmann, TDNT 4:51. Schürmann 1969: 321 adds to the new Moses motif here by alluding to the people meeting Moses in Exod. 19:12, 14, 17, 21–25; 20:18–21; 24:2; 34:3, 29–30. But how certain is this in light of the various groups noted here? There is no idea of Jesus' receiving new revelation from God in the journey up the mountain, only the picture of communing with him in prayer. As was mentioned above, the OT texts keep people at a distance versus engaging them.

16 On κονιορτός (dust), see BAGD 443; BAA 900; Luke 10:11; Acts 13:51; 18:6. On ἐκτινάσσω (to shake off), the verb used in the parallel Mark 6:11 = Matt. 10:14, see BAGD 246; BAA 496; Strathmann, TDNT 4:503. Even though the tense of the Marcan verb is aorist and the Lucan verb is present (Marshall 1978: 354), there is no difference in sense.

21 Strathmann, TDNT 4:492, notes that such testimony treats the resurrection no less objectively than it treats Jesus' passion.

2 Schürer 1890: 105–43. The recent revision of Schürer's work (1973–87: 1.399–427) changes little of the original discussion. Schürer summarizes what was already an old debate, going back at least to Strauss 1972: 152–56 (originally 1835), as noted by Nolland 1989: 99.

3 This view goes back to D. F. Strauss (1972: 352–53 [orignally 1840]), as Plummer 1896: 437 notes. Ellis 1974: 221–22 holds out the possibility of two parables. Marshall 1978: 702 holds that this text supports his two-versions-of-Q theory.

15 Grundmann 1963: 376 argues that the question's force is "why does one say. . . ?" But this could be taken erroneously as a denial of Davidic sonship, a view that goes back to D. F. Strauss (see Plummer 1896: 473). The interrogative πῶς is better understood to press for "in what manner?"

16 The distinction is one that goes back to Aquinas (Summa part 2.1, question 108, article 4), who argues for a difference between command (praeceptum) and counsel (consilium). A command is binding, advice is not —except on those who pursue a special kind of holiness like the monastics. The result is a distinction in Catholic ethics between that which is necessary for gaining eternal bliss and that which aids to that end. See the discussions in Guelich 1982: 15 and Strecker 1988: 15–16.

41 Manson 1949: 265–66 is uncertain about its originality in Luke. Streeter 1924: 277 thinks it original. Ernst 1977: 362 and Fitzmyer 1985: 904 believe it was added later as a baptism formula to be prayed over the individual being baptized. On the use of the prayer in the history of the church, see Manson 1955–56. Besides Marcion and Gregory of Nyssa, the text is found only in manuscripts 162 and 700 and in a shorter form in Maximus the Confessor.

8 Schürmann 1969: 408 n. 8, 409 argues that John's question speaks of kingdom hope in general. John's question was, "Do you bring the kingdom and the promise of God?" This may be a correct way to view the question's force, but behind it must lie a messianic implication, when the other options are rejected. This may be why Marshall 1978: 290 speaks of a vague messianic expectation. Wiefel 1988: 149 notes two options for “Coming One”: an allusion to Dan. 7:13 [Theodotion] with its apocalyptic judge or to Hab. 2:3, which at Qumran was used with apocalyptic, eschatological force. On Hab. 2:3, see Strobel 1961b: 265–77.

4 On the possibility that Luke is from Antioch of Syria, a tradition that Jerome mentions in the prologue of his commentary on Matthew, see Hoehner 1972: 231–32 n. 9; Strobel 1958a; and the introduction to the Gospel of Luke abve, under “Origin and Purpose—Authorship—External Evidence.” Schneider 1977a: 83 and Hoehner 1977: 34 do not agree on the month in view in 27: Schneider has Oct. 1 and Hoehner has Sept. 21.

18 Swartley 1983 is too broad in his perception that the scope of peace automatically encompasses all people; see the introduction to 4:16–30.

3 Talbert 1982: 15–16, who compares Luke’s account to Suetonius’s Lives of the Twelve Caesars, noting how portents, dreams, prophecies, and childhood prodigies dominate the latter source. However, the real literary points of contact with Luke are very few: only the prophecies overlap; Talbert’s other points of contact are forced. Another problem with this analysis is that Talbert extends the unit to 4:15, which clearly mixes two Lucan sections together.

9 Talbert 1982: 24 traces Luke’s portrayal of Mary and notes that she is set forth as a model disciple who obeys God’s Word; Luke 1:38; 8:19–21; 11:27–28; Acts 1:14.

13 Combrink 1973; Talbert 1982: 54–55; Tiede 1988: 103. I present Tiede’s suggestion. See also the further discussion in 4:18.

21 Talbert 1982: 54–55; Tiede 1980: 35. For a definition of chiasmus, see the exegesis of 1:17.

12 Talbert 1982: 65–67 treats 5:30–6:11 as a unit because of the shared theme of controversy and the shared discussion of the new lifestyle of the way with Jesus. Tannehill 1986: 172–76, esp. 173, discusses 5:17–6:11 as a unit of five controversies and notes how Luke tightened the connection in 5:33.

1 An additional thirteen women or groups of women are featured in Acts; see Talbert 1982: 91.

10 Talbert 1982: 92–93; Witherington 1979. On the escalated role of women in the later Jewish synagogue, see Brooten 1982.

1 Talbert 1986: 102 may overplay the differences between Luke and the other Gospels. Matthew and Mark clearly have Herod express the view that Jesus is John the Baptist raised from the dead. Luke has Herod ask only who Jesus is. But this is not really a significant difference; see the exegesis of 9:9. Talbert also notes that this is one of two passages where the question of Jesus' identity is raised directly (9:18 is the other).

9 Talbert 1982: 111–12 sees chiasmus in 9:51–19:44, but has to omit Luke 15 and place 14:1–6 out of its Lucan order! Goulder 1964: 196 argues for the following chiastic links:

10:25	eternal life
11:1	prayer
11:14	healing
11:37	pharisaic hypocrisy
12:1	money

12:35 repentance

13:10 rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts

14:1 rejection of Israel and invitation to outcasts

15:1 repentance

16:1 money

16:14 pharisaic hypocrisy

17:11 healing

17:5 prayer

18:18 eternal life

The most plausible case for chiasmus is made by Farrell 1986. Blomberg also deals with and rejects theories that make the central section a Christian Deuteronomy; see C. F. Evans 1955. My main criticism of Blomberg's article is that it regards the section's end as falling at 18:34, ignoring later literary clues that Jesus has not arrived in Jerusalem (19:28, 41). This may be the Achilles' heel against his theory that the section's parable source was laid out chiastically, especially if 19:11–27 is taken into consideration. Still, aspects of Blomberg's case and the general outline of a possible Lucan source may surface in my discussion; see also Nolland 1993a: 530–31.

58 Tannehill 1986: 233 prefers seventy-two, but does not know which symbolic idea is present, other than a stress on universal mission; so also Talbert 1982: 115.

12 But Talbert's imposition (1982: 122–25) of an exclusive post-Easter transformation of the story from a challenge to an exemplary account misses the force of the pre-Easter legal arguments. What is true for pleasing God is always true—whether one is entering into relationship with him or responding to being in relationship with him. In addition, there is no limitation to such love. The parable does not speak about how God's people are treated in an ecclesiastical or religious setting. When it comes to fundamental human needs and rights, all people deserve such consideration and basic care (Gal. 6:10). There is no more open, public context than the highway that this parable (and moral) travels.

3 Fitzmyer 1985: 891 sees no connection between the accounts, regarding such an association as stretching the point (so also Ernst 1977: 354). But literary sequence and theme make it seem likely; see esp. Talbert 1982: 125.

25 Marshall argues for a causative force here ("cause us not to succumb to temptation") citing 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.8 as reflecting the Hebrew idiom. So also Talbert 1982: 130, citing Luke 4:13; 22:28; Acts 14:22; 20:19 as illustrations of this kind of request.

18 Josephus ties the origin of Jewish exorcism to the days of Solomon; Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; 2.13.3 §286; Tob. 6:1–7; 8:1–3; 1QapGen 20.29; SB 4:533–35; Grundmann 1963: 238; Talbert 1982: 137.

12 Arndt 1956: 303 equates person and time. In contrast, Ellis 1974: 168 and Talbert 1982: 139 suggest that the Spirit is referred to, but this is too specific, since there is no clear contextual indication to him. He is only an implication of what Jesus brings.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see

BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to “acts of mercy”; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, “My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures.” The object of the last clause is not clear (“for heaven,” “of benefits,” “of souls,” or “for myself in the world to come”), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

3 So, e.g., Jeremias 1963a: 45–48. Marshall 1978: 622–23 notes that even if, as he believes, this is a compilation, the teaching still comes from traditional material. Since he defends the authenticity of 16:13, this seems to imply the authenticity of the whole of 16:9–13. Pilgrim 1981: 127, however, alludes to the work of a Christian preacher or teacher. Talbert 1982: 153 is probably incorrect to call 16:8b an initial interpretation of the parable, since it is really an observation that produces an application only by implication. The phrase but I say to you in 16:9 is the start of the parable’s formal application and is not a Lucan expression (Jeremias 1980: 106).

36 Talbert 1982: 153 calls 16:8b the first interpretation of the parable, though this is true only by implication; also Marshall 1978: 619–20 (opting for an end at 16:8a).

9 Most, like Talbert 1982: 166, see Jesus attacking apocalyptic calendar-setting, but this needs careful definition in view of NT exhortations to watch carefully for the Son of Man’s return. Granted, a specific date cannot and should not be sought, but sensitivity to general eschatological sequence or to watchfulness is never condemned (Matt. 24–25 = Mark 13; Luke 21:5–36; Acts 3:11–26). The view is right to deny date-setting, but is wrong to see the only sign as "Spirit-empowered ministry." New Testament eschatological hope is more specific and futurist than this denial suggests. In a more balanced approach, Beasley-Murray 1986: 100 notes that there are "signs" to see—if one has the eyes to see them. Meier 1994: 425 mentions texts where Jesus urges the community of faith to be prepared for a long ministry (Luke 21:7–24; 19:11; Acts 1:6–7; Mark 13:10). But disciples are still to keep looking for Jesus (Matt. 24–25 = Mark 13 = Luke 21:5–36).

1 Talbert 1982: 182 is skeptical that Luke sees a future for Israel, but Luke's terminology about "the times of the Gentiles" and OT fulfillment suggest otherwise, especially given the continued discussion of restoration of the kingdom to Israel in Acts 1:6 and Peter's remarks in Acts 3:20–21.

1 Drury 1976: 49–51 and Tannehill 1974; earlier Cadbury 1958: 192–93. For a fuller list, see Farris 1985: 15.

1 Tannehill 1986: 31 refers to the Magnificat as an operatic aria, where the action stops and the situation is assessed with a flourish. That description may be applied to the Benedictus as well.

46 Tannehill 1986: 34–35 speaks of the reader's sense of tragedy in Luke, since the reader knows that Israel's release did not happen, because it rejected Messiah. A successful outcome of the promise is not yet realized, though Luke still has hope for Israel; cf. Tannehill 1985. The account as a whole is almost a theodicy, explaining what God is doing, despite Messiah's apparent failure. Tiede 1980 develops this idea, including issues tied to the fall of Jerusalem. His view of Luke's understanding of Jerusalem's fall requires that the Gospel of Luke be dated after A.D. 70, which is debatable. However, the term theodicy does apply to the assurance Luke–Acts seeks to give. Tiede's insights on how Luke saw Jerusalem and Israel are valuable.

2 Tannehill 1986: 38 makes this observation and speaks of the birth as more than a family affair.

14 Schürmann 1969: 164; Tannehill 1986: 50, 145. The failure of such an appeal is evident in 16:24, 27, 30.

8 Bultmann 1963: 31–32 (where he calls the account an apophthegm or pronouncement story, which he believes grew into this full-blown account); Creed 1930: 65; Schneider 1977a: 106–7; Klostermann 1929: 62; Fitzmyer 1981: 527; Tannehill 1972; C. F. Evans 1990: 266–67 (who notes a series of Lucan expressions in the account); Goulder 1989: 299. For a summary of the recent discussion and a full bibliography on this passage, see Schreck 1989, while Corrington 1993 evaluates a redactional reading of this text with other types of readings.

20 Grundmann, TDNT 2:301–2; Tannehill 1986: 83. On power: Luke 4:14; 5:17; 6:19; 8:46; Acts 10:38; on miracles: Luke 19:37; Acts 2:22; on authority: Luke 10:19.

12 Talbert 1982: 65–67 treats 5:30–6:11 as a unit because of the shared theme of controversy and the shared discussion of the new lifestyle of the way with Jesus. Tannehill 1986: 172–76, esp. 173, discusses 5:17–6:11 as a unit of five controversies and notes how Luke tightened the connection in 5:33.

1 Tannehill 1986: 214–15 notes that the question appears in various forms in 4:22, 36; 5:21; 7:49; 8:25; and 9:9. He suggests that Jesus' ministry in 8:22–9:17 led to Peter's awareness of who Jesus is.

58 Tannehill 1986: 233 prefers seventy-two, but does not know which symbolic idea is present, other than a stress on universal mission; so also Talbert 1982: 115.

1 Tannehill 1986: 179 argues that the first subunit shows where Jesus and the lawyer are similar, while the parable shows where Jesus' emphasis is unique.

6 Tannehill 1986: 153–56 objects, stressing that the goal in this context is only Jerusalem, not death. The point, however, is what Jerusalem represents and what it will do to this prophet. To separate Jerusalem from a reference to Jesus' death is artificial.

17 Tannehill 1986: 155–56 argues that Luke holds out hope for Israel's future, citing Allison 1983: 75 as support. Allison argues that Jesus uses the standard Jewish form for giving a conditional prophecy; see also Allison 1985: 157. Marshall 1978: 577 leans this way.

1 Tannehill 1986: 183 sees two points of concern for Jesus: (1) humility and (2) no attitude of social exclusion or pride in wealth. Tiede 1988: 263 has a revealing title for this unit: "Seating Charts and Guest Lists in the Kingdom."

20 Tannehill 1986: 157 n. 27 suggests that, in light of the journey imagery, the force is "say farewell." Disciples know that life is not in possessions, so they can part with them and avoid pursuing them as the world does.

1 Bultmann 1963: 33 calls it a “biographical apophthegm” and sees the account as a variant of Mark 1:40–45 (on the Marcan connection, see the discussion of sources and historicity). Berger 1984: 314, 317 speaks of “deesis” or “petitio” because of the appeal for help. Tannehill 1986: 118–20 calls it a “quest story.”

1 Tannehill notes seven quest stories in Luke, this being the only one with a negative result: 5:17–26; 7:1–10; 7:36–50; 17:11–19; 19:1–10; 23:39–43 (I question the presence of a quest story in 7:36–50).

1 Tannehill 1986: 122 calls this account a “quest story,” but this label is not precise. Zacchaeus just wanted to see Jesus, he was not seeking something from him. Tannehill recognizes this and therefore speaks of Jesus going beyond Zacchaeus’s expectations. The story really shows Jesus’ initiative to seek and save the lost (19:10). If there is a quest, it is Jesus’ quest for the lost.

17 This view of the king’s sternness is conceptually like Josephus’s description of a law that punishes slaves more harshly; Against Apion 2.30 §216; C. Taylor 1901; Plato, Laws 913c (11); Brightman 1927–28; Philo, Hypothetica 7.6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

3 Mark 1:16–20 and Luke 5:1–11 are two form parallels; Bovon 1989: 252; Berger 1984: 316 (discusses the parallel in Mark 2:14); V. Taylor 1935: 75. Schürmann 1969: 287 speaks of an apophthegm for the whole account, which combines a call with a controversy account.

5 So V. Taylor 1966: 214–15 defends the authenticity of Mark 2:23–26 and suggests that the time of the event is somewhere between late April and June, because the grain is ready for harvest. Concerning the move from a saying about a human to a saying about the Son of Man (like that in Mark), all that is required is for Jesus to see himself as God's representative to humanity, a concept bound up in the Son of Man discussion and a connection that is quite possible for Jesus here. Matthew and Luke drop the humanity remark because it is an intermediate step in the argument (see excursus 6).

9 For a defense of the authenticity of Mark 2:18–20, and thus of its parallels, see V. Taylor 1966: 208–12 (who argues that the Marcan tradition has roots in an eyewitness and was told to reveal Jesus' mind about fasting); Cranfield 1959: 107–11; Marshall 1978: 223 (though he regards it as possible that Luke 5:36–39 may be a separate tradition). Bovon 1989: 256 also sees a distinct tradition, since Luke's saying has a parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 47, though in a different order (Luke: garment [5:36], then wine [5:37–39]; Thomas: the reverse). Teaching through word linkage was popular in Judaism. When done with the Scriptures, it was called gezerah shewah.

4 Fitzmyer 1981: 753 is too cautious here. Marshall 1978: 350 is correct in calling it "one of the best-attested facts in the life of Jesus," following Manson 1949: 73; also V. Taylor 1966: 302. This tradition contains one of the few sayings of Jesus alluded to by Paul (1 Cor. 9:14).

5 V. Taylor 1935: 147; Fitzmyer 1981: 757. Bultmann 1963: 301–2 does not discuss Luke 9, but the longer parallel of Mark 6:14–29. Berger 1984: 233 speaks of an "uncertain acclamation" present within the account.

2 For excellent overviews of the variety of positions on Lucan redaction, see Soards 1987: 13–16 and V. Taylor 1972: 3–27. Nolland 1993b: 1023 is convinced that Luke had a second source, which he thinks may be a continuous account.

6 While recognizing that the two accounts share some similarities, V. Taylor 1972: 61–64; Schürmann 1957: 63–99; Marshall 1978: 811; and Grundmann 1963: 400 note that Luke does not delay Marcan texts like this elsewhere.

1 Those arguing for an additional source are Fitzmyer 1985: 1456–58 (but not in 22:54–62); Creed 1930: 276 (maybe); Marshall 1978: 839–40, 845, 848; Grundmann 1963: 416, 418–19; Ernst 1977: 612–13, 616, 618; Nolland 1993b: 1092–93, 1098–99, 1104–5; and J. Green 1988: 276. Soards 1987: 100–120 argues for a mixture of tradition, Marcan rewriting, and Lucan rewriting. The classic study on this issue is V. Taylor 1972. Dissent about an extra source outside of some oral material comes from R. Brown 1994: 581–83. Most of Luke's changes (e.g., 22:63–65) reflect his style and vocabulary. But all that this shows is Luke's hand on his sources, not whether additional information existed. Brown sees the "game" in 22:64 as evidence of the presence of oral tradition (see the exegesis). But why limit it here, given evidence of sources throughout this material?

1 Luce 1933: 354 speaks of Mark plus L. Marshall 1978: 878 and V. Taylor 1972: 99–103 say that special Lucan material may appear in 23:55–56. Ernst 1977: 640–41 holds that it is 23:50c, 51a, 53b, 54b. Nolland 1993b: 1162–63 holds to 23:53c and perhaps 23:52–54. Grundmann 1963: 436 holds to 23:50, 51a, 53b, 54–56. Fitzmyer 1985: 1523 holds to 23:53c, 56a. Though it could be debated whether certain verses derive from another source, Luke seems to have had access to additional material, against R. Brown 1994: 1226.

19 Thackeray 1912–13 discusses an idiom (“surrender unconditionally”) possibly found in the greetings in Judg. 18:15; 1 Sam. 10:4; 17:22; 25:5; 30:21; T. Judah 9.7. But this force is less clearly documented; see Nolland 1993a: 764.

8 However, Theissen’s conclusion that this description reflects Luke’s subordinationism is imprecise; see Bock 1987: 66–69. In Luke, Jesus emerges with authority and a role equal to that of God, but Luke builds his Christology from the “earth up” for the benefit of the reader. See Bock 1994c: 102–17.

12 Bultmann 1963: 212, 240; Fitzmyer 1981: 572; Berger 1984: 314; Theissen 1983: 321. Fitzmyer notes that M. Dibelius’s classification of this account as a tale is certainly wrong. Dibelius classifies many miracle stories as tale, reflecting perhaps other presuppositions.

14 Theissen notes that such accounts combine healing and exposition but that exposition dominates. Similarly, Berger 1984: 85 speaks of the binding together of Chrie (his term for “sayings”) and miracle.

6 Theissen 1983: 100 notes Greek parallels in ancient novels. In Greek circles, the rescue involves the appearing of a god; Homer, Hymns 33.12; Aristides, Hymn to Serapis 33. Such rescues are the affairs of divinity. Marshall 1978: 333 notes a parallel to Virgil, Aeneid 4.554–60.

7 Bultmann 1963: 215–16; so also Fitzmyer 1981: 727. Bovon 1989: 422 speaks of a “victory of the hero (German Helden) over the elements,” a rescue miracle, as does Theissen 1983: 321. Bovon says it is like an exorcism, but is distinct.

7 Bultmann 1963: 210 classifies it as a miracle of healing. Bovon 1989: 432 and Theissen 1983: 321 call it an exorcism. Theissen also speaks of the liberation of an enslaved personality (pp. 89–90). Berger 1984: 311 puts it in his “epideixis/demonstratio” category (where he puts many miracles). He also speaks of the account as a “mandatio” that highlights Jesus’ authority and power. Pesch 1971: 354 notes the form elements in Mark: encounter (5:1–2), demon’s defensive reaction (5:6–7), exorcist’s command (5:8), exit of demon (5:13), crowd amazement and spread of exorcist’s fame (5:14a, 18–20).

9 Bultmann 1963: 214–15 (who argues that they were originally separate); Bovon 1989: 444–45 (who speaks of a “crescendo” in this pairing, especially since it includes two women); Fitzmyer 1981: 743; Theissen 1983: 321. Berger 1984: 314, 317 speaks of a “supplication account” by putting it in his “deesis/petitio” category. It also teaches Jesus’ authority, as Berger’s placement in the “mandatio” form shows.

2 Theissen 1983: 177 speaks of natural compression for Matthew and Luke, which is the view of those who hold Marcan priority. Busse 1979: 254 n. 3 notes that Luke has 44 percent fewer words than Mark.

4 F. E. D. Schleiermacher also held this view. On the history of interpretation, see Thiessen 1934; Weinert 1977: 505; and Zerwick 1959.

16 The distinction is one that goes back to Aquinas (Summa part 2.1, question 108, article 4), who argues for a difference between command (praeceptum) and counsel (consilium). A command is binding, advice is not

—except on those who pursue a special kind of holiness like the monastics. The result is a distinction in Catholic ethics between that which is necessary for gaining eternal bliss and that which aids to that end. See the discussions in Guelich 1982: 15 and Strecker 1988: 15–16.

7 Marshall 1978: 572 and Thrall 1962: 20–21 interpret πλήν as "moreover." BAGD 669 §1b and BAA 1346 §1b see it as contrastive, but in this context it is more of an emphatic explanation (§1c in the lexicons).

33 On Jewish views of forgiveness of sin, see Nolland 1989: 236, who notes key studies: Sjö;berg 1938; Thyen 1970; Gradwohl 1974; and Klauck 1981.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 53–57; F. F. Bruce 1988: 6–13 (of Acts); Bovon 1989: 23; Kümmel 1975: 151; Danker 1988: 17–18; Tiede 1980: 1–18, 70; Maddox 1982: 6–9; Esler 1987: 27–29; C. A. Evans 1990: 2; C. F. Evans 1990: 14; L. Johnson 1991: 2–3.

32 Tiede 1988: 37 alludes to Lucian's comparison of a historian's work to a work of fine sculpture.

17 Luke 2:23–24, 27, 37, 39, 46; 16:17; 19:45, 47; 20:1; 21:37–38; 23:56; 24:53; Tiede 1988: 41. These emphases are less pronounced in Acts; consider, e.g., Stephen's critique of the temple in Acts 7 and Peter's warning about the law in Acts 15:10–11. For Luke's complex view of the law, see the introduction to the Gospel of Luke under "Theology—The New Community—Source of Tension: The Law."

1 There are various ways to list the parallels. With only minor variations, I follow Schürmann's list (1969: 59 n. 132). For other arrangements and discussions, see Tiede 1988: 45–47; R. Brown 1977: 293–98; Schneider 1977a: 48; and Creed 1930: 13.

2 Danker 1988: 34, more agnostic, says an attempt to trace the account back to Mary is “pure speculation,” but the attempt to argue Lucan invention is “sheer conjecture.” Tiede 1988: 47 notes that the argument that the tradition had contact with Mary cannot be proved or disproved.

46 Tannehill 1986: 34–35 speaks of the reader’s sense of tragedy in Luke, since the reader knows that Israel’s release did not happen, because it rejected Messiah. A successful outcome of the promise is not yet realized, though Luke still has hope for Israel; cf. Tannehill 1985. The account as a whole is almost a theodicy, explaining what God is doing, despite Messiah’s apparent failure. Tiede 1980 develops this idea, including issues tied to the fall of Jerusalem. His view of Luke’s understanding of Jerusalem’s fall requires that the Gospel of Luke be dated after A.D. 70, which is debatable. However, the term theodicy does apply to the assurance Luke–Acts seeks to give. Tiede’s insights on how Luke saw Jerusalem and Israel are valuable.

14 Creed 1930: 50; Nolland 1989: 141. Tiede 1988: 86 notes the emphasis this idea has in Acts (2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 8:22; 11:18; 17:30; 20:21; 26:20).

1 Tiede 1980: 30–47 develops this theme along with other OT prophetic portraits that influence Luke’s perspective. He argues that the Gentile issue and its defense is a major Lucan concern that is a motivation for this critique, a point with which I totally agree; so Bock 1987: 259, 277–78. The people not only reject Jesus, but they also refuse to be sensitive to his expanded, inclusive mission.

13 Combrink 1973; Talbert 1982: 54–55; Tiede 1988: 103. I present Tiede's suggestion. See also the further discussion in 4:18.

21 Talbert 1982: 54–55; Tiede 1980: 35. For a definition of chiasmus, see the exegesis of 1:17.

7 Tiede 1988: 116–17 cites OT parallels from Exod. 3, Judg. 6, and Isa. 6 as similar in tone, since they are also "call" texts.

9 This classification describes its function most precisely. See also Hubbard 1977 and Tiede 1988: 117 (who prefers to call the account an "epiphany-call" story to emphasize the disclosure of divine presence).

30 Tiede 1988: 122 notes that to always associate disease with a specific sin can be cruel. In this text, the condition is present as evidence of the fallen state of the human race and the disorder in creation, which Jesus has come to put right again. Luke 13:1–5 is also against assuming a specific reference here. That sin is a general reality in the creation explains why creation groans until full redemption comes (Rom. 8:19–25). When James (5:16) calls for confession of sin in the face of sickness, he simply recognizes that sin may be involved (note the third-class condition in James 5:15; so also conceptually 1 Cor. 11:30). Illness may or may not be related to specific sin.

37 Tiede 1988: 122 compares the statement rhetorically with other such "easier" statements in 16:17 and 18:24–25. Common in Judaism, this kind of remark involves difficult comparisons and is to be pondered over. Jesus connects the two issues by his remarks and actions. The remarks make his miracle an audiovisual of a more basic spiritual reality.

17 Tiede 1988: 130 cites Acts 5:31 and 11:18 as evidence of a “new era” of repentance. Acts 1:1–11 discusses Jesus’ departure. The problem with this suggestion is that it treats repentance as if it is a fresh theme in Acts, since Tiede speaks of a “new phase” of repentance. But repentance is a constant theme in Luke (5:32; 10:13–15; 15:1–32).

18 Fitzmyer 1981: 624, Schürmann 1969: 322, and Bovon 1989: 286 are certain about the Gentile allusion (Luke 2:31–32; 3:6; 4:25–29). Ernst 1977: 212, Marshall 1978: 242, and Tiede 1988: 136 are more cautious.

1 Tiede 1988: 147–48 sees 7:1–9:50 as a unit (which he calls “Identifying the Messiah of God”) in which Luke describes the “christological drama” of demonstrating who Jesus is. Tiede argues that 7:1–50 presents Jesus as the prophet of God. But “the one to come” (7:18–23) is not a prophet, but the promised deliverer. In addition, 8:1–3 deals with response, not proclamation, and therefore belongs with the emphasis of chap. 7. Tiede is right that Christology is a major concern until 9:50, but the chapter divisions, which came centuries after Luke was written, are misleading, and it is therefore better to divide 7:1–9:50 into three units—7:1–8:3; 8:4–9:17; 9:18–50—for reasons that I shall make clear in the exegesis.

6 For Q as the basic source, see Schürmann 1969: 413, 418; Marshall 1978: 287; Fitzmyer 1981: 662–63; Tiede 1988: 153; Wiefel 1988: 148; Bovon 1989: 369. Those who prefer Matthean priority argue that Luke used Matthew. Luke 7:20–21, 29–30 does not have a parallel in Matthew.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst

1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

1 This miracle cluster is paralleled in Mark 4:35–5:43; Marshall 1978: 332–33; Fitzmyer 1981: 726–27; Tiede 1988: 170; Wiefel 1988: 163 n. 1.

25 According to Arndt 1956: 247, this is the only place where Jesus makes such an address. However, he has missed 13:16, where a woman is addressed as a daughter of Abraham (noted by Tiede 1988: 176). Cf. the description of Zacchaeus as "son of Abraham" in 19:9. Bovon 1989: 450 and n. 50 notes that the term suggests Jesus' authority. See also Ps. 45:10 [44:11 LXX]; Zeph. 3:14; and Lam. 4:21–22. The length of the woman's problem suggests that she is older than Jesus.

4 Note the passive progressive construction: ἦν παρακεκαλυμμένον (was being hidden). Marshall 1978: 394 notes that this construction with ἀπό (from) is a Hebraism; Ezek. 22:26; BDF §155.3. Citing Exod. 7:13–14 ("Pharaoh's heart was hardened"), Tiede 1988: 193 argues that the passive is ambiguous about the concealer's identity. Such remarks are usually tied to God's sovereignty (1 Cor. 1:30; 2:6–9). Regardless, the implication is that such concealment can be overturned only by attention to God's message. Nolland 1993a: 514 holds out the possibility of Satanic binding, noting that by 24:25 the disciples are seen as responsible for failing to understand. Nolland may be right.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses'

addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 (“leans” this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

5 Creed 1930: 159 speaks of Q here, as does Manson 1949: 83. The amount of Matthean-Lucan agreement makes this source connection likely, though whether it is Q or another shared tradition is debatable (Matthean prioritists see Matthew as the likely source). Grundmann 1963: 236–37 correctly notes that Matthew is closer to Luke than to Mark (see also Easton 1913, as discussed in n. 1 above). Fitzmyer 1985: 918 argues for Lucan additions in 11:16, but is uncertain about it in 11:14, 21–22. Additional source material cannot be ruled out. Tiede 1988: 216 notes that Matt. 12:23 and Mark 3:11 stress Christology, while Luke emphasizes controversy with the leadership; but Luke also has strong Christology in light of the parable in 11:21–23. Of the three accounts, Mark has less confrontation than the other two.

1 This is one of the few units in the journey narrative with material that might be parallel with Mark. That the first three subunits in this pericope have a variety of traditional contacts (Q, L, triple tradition) shows that this material's tradition as a whole existed in some variety. Tiede 1988: 218 speaks of Q material for all of 11:29–36. Luke may be pulling material together here to stress the importance of response as rejection grows.

7 Tiede 1988: 233; Ernst 1977: 398; Fitzmyer 1985: 970; Lev. 19:18. Manson 1949: 271 notes the similar OT perspective: Job 31:24–25; Ps. 49; Eccles. 2:1–11. Note also T. Judah 18–19; Sir. 11:18–19; 1 Enoch 97.8–10; Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14; B. Scott 1989: 131–32.

7 With reference to seeking the kingdom, Tiede 1988: 238 says, "This reign may well seem foolish and vulnerable by the standards of those who have wealth and power, but it is the very strength of God for living in uncertain times with the security of God's reign."

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

13 Tiede 1988: 241 sees "all" people in the parable, for some are placed with the unfaithful, while others suffer some punishment without being banished.

1 Ellis 1974: 184; Danker 1988: 259; Tiede 1988: 247; Creed 1930: 180. In addition to the Josephean references in the list in the exegesis of 13:1, see also Life 17 §92.

1 Tannehill 1986: 183 sees two points of concern for Jesus: (1) humility and (2) no attitude of social exclusion or pride in wealth. Tiede 1988: 263 has a revealing title for this unit: "Seating Charts and Guest Lists in the Kingdom."

2 So Blomberg 1990: 237–39; Kistemaker 1980: 193–201; Plummer 1896: 359–60; Liefeld 1984: 979. Those accepting one parable but distinct sources are Luce 1933: 248; Grundmann 1963: 296 (L); Ernst 1977: 442 (L); Marshall 1978: 584; Tiede 1988: 266 (apparently). Ellis 1974: 194 is uncertain. Blomberg 1990: 233–36 has a good discussion of this parable.

12 In Prov. 24:3–6, wisdom builds a house and wages war; Schweizer 1984: 241; Tiede 1988: 270–71.

2 So Fitzmyer 1985: 1073 argues that 15:4–6 is from Q and that originally the two parables were not told together. He sees Matthew's setting as more original. But why Jesus could not tell back-to-back parables that make the same point is not clear. Nor is it clear that 15:4–6 is from Q. Tiede 1988: 273 sees independent oral tradition here.

1 Tiede sees this unit starting in 16:10. But the theme of money is tied to the parable of the crafty steward and thus 16:8–13 needs to be kept with 16:1–7. Luke 16:14–15 is a bridge moving from money to the morality of the new era.

2 Tiede 1988: 304 adds three other themes: (1) being faithful in prayer (18:1), (2) knowing that the delay does not mean that God is indifferent (18:2–7), and (3) keeping the faith (18:8).

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

3 Tiede 1988: 310 notes the options: a synagogue official, leader of the Pharisees, magistrate, or official of the high priest. The last two options are more likely here. If he had been a religious leader, Luke likely would have been more specific.

3 Tiede 1988: 315 mentions Isa. 50:6; 53; and Ps. 2 as key texts. On the uncertainty of Isa. 50:6, see the exegesis of Luke 18:33.

19 Dodd 1947: 49 argues that all the language is from the OT, as does Gaston 1970: 359, citing a catena of verses: Jer. 8:18; 9:1; 6:14, 6, 15, 8. Manson 1949: 319–20 cites Jer. 8:18–22, although the whole of Jer. 8:13–22, along with Jer. 6:6–21 and Isa. 29:1–4, might also be relevant. See also Plummer 1896: 451–52. Tiede 1980: 68–86 challenges Gaston's view that Luke has four stages here: salvation to part of Israel, fulfillment of threat, salvation to Gentiles, and the end. He sees a theodicy in Luke–Acts, where Luke explains how Jerusalem crumbled and yet Luke argues that God still will be faithful by restoring Israel. This is quite possible, though Tiede argues for a post–a.d. 70 date for the book, which is less likely.

27 Tiede 1980: 82 mentions Jer. 22:8 and 23:38. This is a national indictment like that of the exile. As Tiede says (p. 68), "Love for Israel, conflicting with wrath, characterizes this oracle of judgment." Weatherly 1994 attempts to limit the responsibility for Jesus' death to Jerusalem and its leaders. He is right that Luke presents a "divided nation" and limits responsibility for the death here, but these indictments become national as a result. Covenant judgment tends to be national.

1 In fact, a Galilean named Judas revolted in a.d. 6 because he did not want to pay such taxes; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.1 §118; Tiede 1988: 344.

2 Tiede 1988: 343 correctly remarks that this text does not endorse the "two-kingdoms" doctrine or the separation of church and state. It sets forth no political religious theory. It simply acknowledges the presence of civil government and its right to sustain itself through the contributions of its citizens.

34 So Tiede 1980: 87–96 correctly shows that Luke teaches vengeance on Israel followed by vindication. Acts 3:19–21 suggests this most clearly, but so does Luke 13:35b by pointing to a day when Israel will respond to Messiah; see also C. A. Evans 1990: 313–14.

9 Tiede 1988: 415 is close to view 2, arguing that if the nation does this atrocity now, surely they will pay for it later.

24 The distributive singular καρδία indicates that the heart burned in each of them; Marshall 1978: 898; Col. 3:16; BDF §140. The periphrastic idiom pictures a running emotion; Plummer 1896: 557–58. On the sense of καρδία in Luke, see 1:51, 66; 2:19, 35, 51; 3:15; 5:22; 9:47; 24:25; Tiede 1988: 437.

1 For more detail about the Son of Man debate and an extended version of this excursus, see Bock 1991c. Key recent studies (with full bibliographies) include Colpe, TDNT 8:400–77; Casey 1979; Caragounis 1986; S. Kim 1985; Tö;dt 1979 (whose work Kim in particular critiques).

6 For the structure, see Bailey 1976: 159–61; Blomberg 1990: 173–74; and Tolbert 1979: 98–100. Blomberg argues for a plausible threefold division: younger son’s departure (15:11–20a), father’s welcome (15:20b–24), and older son’s reaction (15:25–32).

9 Fitzmyer 1985: 1168–69 defends the ordinal μίαν as meaning “one,” not “first” (against Plummer 1896: 407) or “very much” (against Torrey 1933: 312; Manson 1949: 142) or “just one” (against Rigaux 1970: 410).

9 See McArthur 1960: 105–27; Carson 1984: 126–27; Jeremias 1963b: 1–12, 19–23; Hunter 1965: 107–11; Toussaint 1980: 86–94; Bauman 1985; and J. Martin 1986.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

16 Plummer 1896: 57. Traub, TDNT 5:537–38, discusses the "heavenly host." A singular noun joined to a plural participle is an ad sensum construction; BDR §134.1b.

5 Bovon 1989: 179 n. 65. He notes Isa. 64:1 [63:19 MT]; T. Levi 18.6–7. One could add 3 Macc. 6:18; 2 Bar. 22.1; Traub, TDNT 5:530 n. 263. Also seeing the presence of apocalyptic elements is Witherington 1990: 149, who compares the text to Rev. 1 and defends the event's authenticity as a vision.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

14 Plummer 1896: 75 cites H. B. Tristram. Wight 1953: 121 also mentions a split travel custom of children spending time with kin and neighbors, but without citing ancient evidence.

1 For the major essays on this theme, see Tuckett 1983, especially the critique of Wrede by Dunn (pp. 116–31, originally Dunn 1970b), who also sees the historical roots of the secret residing in Jesus' ministry.

2 This issue is particularly acute if Matthew was the first Gospel, for Matthew's eschatological discourse not only has the Olivet remarks but also a series of graphic and theologically significant eschatological parables unique to his treatment. If Matthew is first and Luke knew him, why would Luke leave them out, since he loves parables, including eschatological parables (12:35–48; 18:1–8; 19:11–27)? Matthean prioritists have difficulty explaining this situation, which is a strong argument that Mark was written before Matthew. For how the various Synoptic theories approach this material, see the essays by C. M. Tuckett, F. Neirynck, and A. J. McNicol in Dungan 1990: 63–80, 108–24, 157–200.

18 C. Turner 1925–26: 113–25; Glickman 1983: 86–87. Stegner 1989: 15–31 stresses this Genesis connection over the regal motifs, tying ἀγαπητός to the Jewish motifs of the binding of Isaac. Currently, this may well be the most popular explanation. Gen. 22:2 is also mentioned as having the same basic phrase, though the expression there is in the accusative case. Other LXX uses of this phrase occur in Jer. 6:26; Amos 8:10; and Zech. 12:10.

17 Any charge today that dispensationalism sees two ways of salvation or sees too great a law/grace contrast in the sermon grossly misrepresents where many of its adherents are now. Such a monolithic view of dispensationalism fails to see the variations that have long been a part of this approach. Gerstner 1991 irresponsibly engages in such confusion and minimizes the significance of such differences, which dispensationalists like C. C. Ryrie and J. D. Pentecost have long noted. Gerstner's charge of antinomianism is a distortion that warps his ability to appreciate the distinctions in the movement. The charge also underestimates the significance of the current discussion about the function of the law within covenant theology, as well as its debate with theonomy; see D. Turner 1991; J. Martin 1986; and J. Martin 1992.

19 Stylistically this is like some OT phrases, e.g., "advanced in days" (Gen. 18:11; 24:1; Josh. 13:1; 23:1; 1 Kings 1:1); BDF §197; N. Turner 1963: 220 (dative of respect using ἐν); Luke 1:18; 2:36; Delling, TDNT 2:947–50, and esp. n. 42.

43 On the grammar of this emphatic command, see N. Turner 1963: 96; BDF §365.3; the LXX of Num. 6:3 and 1 Sam. 1:11 lacks μή.

46 On the grammar, see N. Turner 1963: 180; Matt. 19:12; Acts 3:2; 14:8.

48 On ἐν substituting for εἰς and meaning "into," see BDF §218; N. Turner 1963: 257.

24 Διανοίᾳ is singular according to Greek idiom, an idiom that English renders in the plural, "thoughts"; Ps. 75:6 LXX is a grammatical parallel; Klostermann 1929: 20; N. Turner 1963: 23.

16 The verbal complex ἔσονται … διαμεμερισμένοι (it shall be … divided) recalls the noun of 12:51; Fitzmyer 1985: 997; Marshall 1978: 548; N. Turner 1963: 89. This periphrastic construction is a future perfect that focuses on a state of division.

7 On the use of εἰ to introduce questions, see N. Turner 1963: 333; BDF §440.3; BDR §440.3.5; Gen. 17:17; Matt. 12:10; 19:3; Luke 22:49; Acts 1:6; 22:25. Luke uses this construction for an "indirect question" nineteen times.

3 Twelftree 1993 gives a detailed survey of the texts involving Jesus as exorcist. After a careful study, he concludes: "The first result we can record from our study is that we are able unhesitatingly to support the view that Jesus was an exorcist" (p. 225). This theme is too widely attested in the sources to be denied. Meier 1994: 646–77 is more circumspect in his approach to the seven NT exorcisms, rating some as having historical roots:

the possessed boy (Mark 9:14–29 = Matt. 17:14–21 = Luke 9:37–43a), Mary Magdalene (Luke 8:2), and the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:1–20 = Matt. 8:28–34 = Luke 8:26–39). Luke 4:33–37 = Mark 1:21–28 (man in the synagogue) probably reflects "the sort of thing" that Jesus did in ministry. Meier is uncertain about the account of the mute/blind demoniac (in part, because of its brevity), though leaning toward historicity (Luke 11:14–15 = Matt. 12:22–23). Meier doubts Matt. 9:32–33 (mute demoniac) and Mark 7:24–30 = Matt. 15:21–28 (Syrophoenician woman). With typical circumspection, Meier concludes: "A decision that in any of these exorcisms a true miracle has taken place—in other words, that God has directly acted beyond all human potentiality to heal a particular individual—goes beyond what any scholar can say on purely historical grounds" (p. 661). Ironically enough, to decide for miracle is the very conclusion that Jesus' remarks desire.

1 For solid overviews of this area, see McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987. McKnight is slightly more confident than I am of Marcan priority, though I still regard it likely that Mark was the first Gospel written. Still, his and Stein's overviews show why many think Mark's Gospel is first. For a comparative study of the two major options in the debate, see Bellinzoni, Tyson, and Walker 1985 and Dungan 1990. A study making significant points about Q and the complex interrelationship of the Gospel writers is Reicke 1986. For the case for Matthean priority, see Farmer 1964.

4 Tyson 1960: 245 supports the account's historicity because of the positive or at least neutral portrayal of the Pharisees here.

5 Calling the trial a literary “nonevent,” Tyson 1986: 133–35 says that Luke’s description of Herod is “pale.” Herod is not an opponent here, but a curious bystander, maybe even a frustrated one. Ἐπηρώτα in 23:9 is a conative imperfect: “he tried to question”; BDF §326.

24 Luke uses ὡσεί (about) frequently to show approximate time; Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 24:11; cf. Acts 2:15; 3:1; 10:3, 9; 23:23). Ἤδη (already) is also frequent: Matthew uses it seven times, Mark eight times, Luke ten times, elsewhere in the NT thirty-six times; Plummer 1896: 536; Untergassmair 1980: 85 n. 372.

33 Matthew uses δοξάζω (to praise) four times, Mark once, and John twenty-three times. Of Luke’s fourteen uses, five are in Acts, five are in unique Lucan material (2:20; 4:15; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15), one in agreement with Mark (5:26), and three in pericopes parallel to Mark but Mark lacks the term (5:25; 18:43; 23:47); Untergassmair 1980: 91 n. 408; Plummer 1896: 539.

35 The present participle συνακολουθοῦσαι (those who are following), given this context, suggests that they are still following him. Galilee is again mentioned as an important reference point in Jesus’ ministry; Luke 4:14, 44 (variant reading); 17:11; 23:5; 24:6; Acts 10:37; 13:31; Untergassmair 1980: 103.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB 1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

25 On how the ancients attempted to treat fever, see Van Der Loos 1965: 553–54 and n. 3.

40 Van Der Loos 1965: 78–79, 110–13 notes that not all disease is possession nor is all possession disease. On the distinction between miracles and magic, see Witherington 1990: 156–60; on Luke's antimagic polemic, see Garrett 1989, who defers from answering any historical questions, staying at the literary level.

6 So hold most scholars. For discussion, see Schneider 1977a: 122–23; Marshall 1978: 199; Fitzmyer 1981: 561 (who speaks of L, where the postresurrection tradition was already moved back; Luke simply used L and joined it to Marcan material); Ernst 1977: 184–85 (who goes on to say that Luke is not merely embellishing Mark); Van Der Loos 1965: 670; Schramm 1971: 37–40 (who sees mostly Marcan material); Dietrich 1972: 25–38 (who explains why Mark alone cannot be the source).

21 Rengstorf, TDNT 1:330, says that Peter is regarded as a sinner "by the community." Van Der Loos 1965: 671 agrees with the above assessment of the fishing occupation, while Schürmann 1969: 270 n. 54 disagrees, noting that no evidence exists for this view of fishermen in the first century; so also SB 1:187. Schürmann is surely right here.

16 BAGD 471 (with bibliography); BAA 957; Van Der Loos 1965: 465–68; Michaelis, TDNT 4:233–34; Harrison, NIDNTT 2:463–66; SB 4:745–63; Pousma 1975: 138–39. Λέπρα occurs in the NT only in Matt. 8:3 = Mark 1:42 = Luke 5:12–13. A related term, λεπρός, appears in Luke 4:27; 7:22; 17:12; Matt. 8:2; 10:8; 11:5; 26:6; Mark 1:40; 14:3.

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός

(stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

29 If so, the less natural lexical meaning is not necessary; Marshall 1978: 213; Kelso 1962: 544; Van Der Loos 1965: 441 n. 3.

34 BAGD 548 §2; BAA 1112 §2; Van Der Loos 1965: 438–39; Bovon 1989: 274. The term ξηρός means "withered," so that the hand has suffered atrophy. The term also appears in the parallel Matt. 12:10 = Mark 3:3; and Luke 6:8; John 5:3; Matt. 23:15; Heb. 11:29.

5 Carson 1984: 214 suggests that the discipleship emphasis is overdrawn, especially when it is treated as Matthew's sole concern. Van Der Loos 1965: 649 argues that calling the boat the "ship of the church" originates in the "ship-yard of the imagination." The miracle pictures spiritual truth, but it is not allegory, nor does it focus only on discipleship.

13 This may also be the significance of the request in Luke 8:31 not to be sent into the abyss; Van Der Loos 1965: 387 n. 4. 1 Enoch 56.3; T. Moses 10.11–12; and T. Levi 18 reflect such an eschatological judgment (the T. Moses reference is disputed; see J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.932, 933 n. g).

19 Against Van Der Loos 1965: 389, who argues that the request in Mark not to be sent to a "distant country" means a faraway land, not Hades. He does cite a parallel in Tob. 8:3, where the odor of a burning fish so repelled a demon that he fled to the “faraway land” of Egypt (and thus could not seize Tobias). But one cannot be certain of this parallel’s influence on Mark.

16 Against Van Der Loos 1965: 514, who argues that Jesus did not know. Fitzmyer 1981: 746 argues that the question sounds “stupid,” and it does at first glance, as Peter’s reaction shows. But, given the emphasis in these accounts on Jesus’ control over events, the question calls for reflection about why Jesus would ask it.

17 Van Der Loos 1965: 512–15 is right to separate the question of the Gospels’ view from that of the woman. See his questions (a) and (d).

31 Van Der Loos 1965: 569 takes Jesus’ remark about sleep to indicate a coma, ignoring the use of sleep as a common figure for death (see the next paragraph). There is no indication that the crowd has misread the situation. In fact, this view destroys the parallelism with 7:11–17.

32 Van Der Loos 1965: 572 cites OT precedent (Judg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 30:12); more correct is Schneider 1977a: 199. In Judaism, see 1 Enoch 22.1–14; 39.4–8. Nolland 1989: 422 notes a possible contact with 1 Kings 17:21–22.

11 For other OT and rabbinic parallels, see Van Der Loos 1965: 624–27, but these parallels deal more with the constant availability of food.

12 John 6:9 mentions barley loaves. On this kind of food, see Van Der Loos 1965: 622 n. 3. SB 1:683–84 notes that barley bread was not well liked.

6 On the Jewish attitude toward epilepsy, see Van Der Loos 1965: 401–5, who notes that Balaam and Saul were thought by some to have suffered from the disease (Num. 24:4; 1 Sam. 19:24). David feigned epilepsy before Saul (1 Sam. 21:13 [21:14 MT]). The ancient figure probably alludes to a fear of the influence of the moon. Greek culture also tied epilepsy to the moon's activity.

7 In Luke 1:20 the impediment is said to be from God; in Mark 7:32 no cause is stated, but Mark 9:17 links demonic activity with the lack of speech. On Jewish thinking about the association of disease or disability and demons, see SB 4:501–35; Van Der Loos 1965: 351–53; Ernst 1977: 373.

6 Lev. Rab. 15.2 on 13:2 comments on Job 28:25: "Man is evenly balanced, half of him is water, and the other half is blood. When he is deserving, the water does not exceed the blood, nor does the blood exceed the water; but when he sins, it sometimes happens that the water gains over the blood and then he becomes a sufferer from dropsy; at other times the blood gains over the water and he then becomes leprous"; Van Der Loos 1965: 505.

5 On the use of φωνή (voice), see Luke 11:27; Acts 4:24; Gen. 39:15, 18; Judg. 21:2; 1 Sam. 11:4; Van Der Loos 1965: 496 n. 4; Klostermann 1929: 173. The call for mercy is also used in the Psalter (e.g., 109:21; Glö;ckner 1983: 139–40), but not much can be made of this general expression, as Nolland 1993a: 846 indicates.

2 Schürmann 1969: 139 notes numerous Semitisms in earlier accounts and says this account has more unmistakable traces of Greek and Lucan expression. The most influential study here is Van Iersel 1960.

33 Ireland 1992: 36, 41 reports that this view goes back to D. Schulz in 1821 and was tied to ancient practice by J. J. Van Oosterzee in 1859. It has recently been defended through appeal to Jewish practice by Derrett 1970: 48–77. Fitzmyer 1964 adds an additional twist to this view: this interest was the steward's commission, making his action of canceling the interest only a clever pretense of personal sacrifice.

11 Van Unnik 1979: 40–42, esp. n. 23, cites Lucian's use of ἀνατάσσομαι in How to Write History 47–48. See also Van Unnik 1973. It should be said, however, that when used in a prologue and tied to a word like ἐπιχειρέω, ἀνατάσσομαι suggests written or at least well-organized reports. Also in favor of written predecessors is Du Plessis 1974: 262–63. Written sources are still the most likely referent here. My point is that we cannot be sure that Luke did not mean more than that, especially since multiple sources are mentioned.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

5 So Vermes 1973: 178, who discusses classifications 1 and 2 and prefers #2.

9 If, of course, Vermes is right that the term did mean "I and no other," then the claim is more direct and the meaning is transparent. Matt. 9 suggests either that this is not the force or that the crowd misunderstood the claim. Either option is possible in Matt. 9.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon

1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

43 Among those who support this approach are Schürmann 1969: 302; Vogt 1959; Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; and apparently Danker 1988: 130. Marshall 1978: 230 is uncertain of the origin.

14 Strathmann, TDNT 4:235; Luce 1933: 134; Fitzmyer 1981: 591; Schürmann 1969: 289–90; Vö;lkel 1978; Jeremias 1931; E. Sanders 1985: 174–211.

16 Walker suggests that openness and challenge of sin cannot be put side by side. He opts for the challenge to sin.

1 For solid overviews of this area, see McKnight 1991b and Stein 1987. McKnight is slightly more confident than I am of Marcan priority, though I still regard it likely that Mark was the first Gospel written. Still, his and Stein's overviews show why many think Mark's Gospel is first. For a comparative study of the two major options in the debate, see Bellinzoni, Tyson, and Walker 1985 and Dungan 1990. A study making significant points about Q and the complex interrelationship of the Gospel writers is Reicke 1986. For the case for Matthean priority, see Farmer 1964.

1 Wall 1989 argues that this story is a call to hear the word similar to Deut. 8:3. He also argues that Luke 10:25–37 is an example story expounding Deut. 7:12. This connection with Deuteronomy is stronger in Luke 10:38–42 than in 10:25–37.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson

1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like "hand of God" (1:66) and "arm of God" (1:51).

22 Wall 1987 sees an allusion to Deut. 9:10 and not to the Exodus text. He argues that, just as Moses reminded the rebellious people that God's finger had written the law, so Jesus reveals his messianic mission and covenant connection, since Satan is cast out. Though possible, this approach seems overly subtle and understates the force of the war imagery in 11:21–22, which explains this remark through parable.

10 The stone as a messianic image in Judaism draws esp. on Isa. 28:16 and Dan. 2:44–45; but see also Gen. 28:17–19; Zech. 4:8–10; 3:8–9; Tg. Ps. 118:24 (printed in Walton 1657: 3.274; see Ellis 1974: 233). For Tg. Isa. 28:16 and other Jewish parallels, see Jeremias, TDNT 4:272–73. Tg. Isa. 28:16(CALTGO) reads: "Behold I set in Zion a king, a mighty king, mighty and terrible, whom I will uphold and strengthen; the prophet says: 'And the righteous in whom is confidence shall not tremble when affliction comes.'" conflicting with wrath, characterizes this oracle of judgment." Weatherly 1994 attempts to limit the responsibility for Jesus' death to Jerusalem and its leaders. He is right that Luke presents a "divided nation" and limits responsibility for the death here, but these indictments become national as a result. Covenant judgment tends to be national.

27 Tiede 1980: 82 mentions Jer. 22:8 and 23:38. This is a national indictment like that of the exile. As Tiede says (p. 68), "Love for Israel,

21 His six categories (pp. 254–60) are Yahweh returning through a future agent, Davidic Messiah, Aaronic Messiah, Michael/Melchizedek, Son of Man, and Elijah redivivus. Of the focused categories that Webb examines, the closest correspondences occur in the Son of Man and Davidic Messiah categories, though the category that has the most contact with John's expectation is Yahweh returning through an agent.

4 F. E. D. Schleiermacher also held this view. On the history of interpretation, see Thiessen 1934; Weinert 1977: 505; and Zerwick 1959.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

72 Marshall 1978: 62, citing Sahlin 1945a: 96–97. Klostermann 1929: 11 cites B. Weiss, while he seemingly rejects the view.

25 Schürer 1973–87: 2.381–403; R. Meyer and H. Weiss, TDNT 9:11–48. For Luke and the Pharisees, see Carroll 1988.

35 On the combination scribes and Pharisees, see Luke 5:21; 7:30; 11:53; 15:2; Mark 7:5; H. Weiss, TDNT 9:38.

11 Hoehner 1977: 14–15; K. Weiss, TDNT 9:81 n. 12. For the force of ἀπογράφεσθαι as a middle verb, “to register oneself,” see BDF §317; in favor of the middle voice are 2:3, 5.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB 1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

5 Creed 1930: 73 mentions J. Wellhausen as holding this view. Luce 1933: 127 also discusses this option.

12 Black 1967: 216–17. This view goes back to J. Wellhausen’s 1903 commentary on Mark. Oepke, TDNT 5:311 n. 6, mentions this view but prefers to see a contradiction here. Oepke notes that Wellhausen rejected this solution in the 1911 edition of his Mark commentary.

22 Wellhausen 1904: 550 notes that the Syriac version omitted the term. Fitzmyer 1985: 1147 notes the etymological suggestion of Kilgallen 1982 that the term means “those to whom something is not owed.” Usage is against this sense, though Blomberg 1990: 262 takes it as possible.

6 D. Wenham 1972. Schürmann 1969: 461 agrees only for 8:9–10. Fitzmyer 1981: 700–701 apparently rejects this suggestion but without clear support.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974: 180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 987 speaks of elements going back to Jesus that focus on God's final vindicating judgment. This approach may be too broad in ignoring the Son of Man–Jesus linkage, about whose secondary character Fitzmyer is uncertain. Nolland 1993a: 700 accepts all the material as authentic except 12:42, 46c, 47–48. Though some Lucan summary touches exist (e.g., 12:41–42a), all of the material, including Peter's question, coheres with Jesus' teaching. For a defense of the traditional roots of 12:41, see D. Wenham 1984: 57–62.

6 Manson 1949: 144 never really explains how the Lot material in Luke 17 entered Q or why Matthew left it out. To his credit, Wenham notes his three major problems (1984: 149, 157–65), but seems hard-pressed to defend the form of 17:25, 29–30, 31–32. His discussion posits many reasons for the presence of some items. The argument is plausible, even possible, but is it the most likely?

4 A detailed demonstration of the solution to this problem is beyond the scope of a commentary on Luke. Marshall 1978: 758 notes that no good solution to the transmission question can be clearly demonstrated and that the general teaching coheres with Jesus' teaching elsewhere—which means that the material's core goes back to Jesus. Each of the monographs behind views 1–4 engages in detailed analyses of the text and its OT roots—something more conservative studies frequently lack. Wenham's work (view 5) is an exception to this pattern, as is that of Beasley-Murray.

25 For an excellent discussion of the history of interpretation of these passages, see Heth and Wenham 1984. For the debate, see House 1990.

27 For a defense of this position, see Murray 1953 and Hoehner 1987. For a defense of these grounds for divorce, but with no right to remarry, see Heth and Wenham 1984. Against a no-divorce-no-remarriage position stands Paul's reading of Jesus' command in 1 Cor. 7:12–16, which allows for divorce in the case of an unbeliever's desertion. Surely if Jesus' remarks were to be taken in the most strict sense, Paul would not have allowed this possibility, since an absolute view of a text such as Luke 16:18 apparently would have prohibited this option.

5 Rist 1978. J. Wenham 1992b: 223 dates Matthew in 42, Mark in 45, and Luke in 55 at the latest—dates that are much earlier than typically assigned to the Gospels. Most conservatives place the Synoptics in the sixties, while most others have dates ranging from 60 to 90.

11 J. Wenham 1978–79 questions the originality of all the Marcan references to two crowings (Mark 14:30, 68, 72). The external evidence, however, for omitting the two crowings is not strong: of the three Marcan mentions of the double cock-crowing, codex א omits all three (Mark 14:30, 68, 72), B omits one (14:68), and C* omits two (14:30, 72).

19 The shorter reading (i.e., ἰᾶσθαι without any object) has been found in critical texts since Westcott-Hort. Recent texts bracket the object, expressing uncertainty about its presence, even though they retain it.

5 On these differences, see the exegesis of 24:1, 5–6. Though my approach to correlation differs from Westcott's proposed order (1908: 2.335–36) of resurrection events, his list shows that the accounts need not be contradictory.

19 Westcott and Hort 1881: 2.175–77 ("Introduction") call this phrase a "Western noninterpolation" because of this shorter-reading rule. Other such noninterpolations are Luke 22:19b–20; 24:6, 12, 36, 40, 51, 52; Matt. 27:49. A Western noninterpolation is a shorter Western reading, in contrast to the normally expansive pattern of the Western family. Those who call these passages "noninterpolations" are arguing that the Gospel originally omitted them since they are the shorter reading.

19 Godet 1875: 2.64 notes that W. M. L. de Wette and H. A. W. Meyer held this view in the nineteenth century. Shirock 1992 now ably defends this view, noting that it was the view of Chrysostom, Homilies on Matthew 41 (on Matt. 12:25–26). He gives six reasons for the view, the most compelling of which I note on p. 1078. If this view is correct, a major reason for separating 11:19 from 11:20 in the original tradition—namely, the difference in meaning of "you" in each verse—disappears. Evidence of the presence God's kingdom is seen in Jesus and his followers. If this is the argument, Jesus is noting evidence of God's grace in Israel!

1 Bovon 1989: 30 n. 1 notes that these comparisons with ancient prologues date back to the eighteenth century with G. Raphelius and J. J. Wettstein. C. F. Evans 1990: 116–19 cites several of these "scientific prefaces."

10 For details, see Schürer 1973–87: 2.246–50, 287; Wiefel 1988: 47; Schrenk, TDNT 3:262; and esp. Jeremias 1969: 199.

37 Creed 1930: 19; Schneider 1977a: 50; Schürmann 1969: 49–50; Fitzmyer 1981: 348–50; Wiefel 1988: 51–52; Ernst 1977: 72; R. Brown 1977: 309. Gewiess, in an appendix to Laurentin's German 1967 edition, interestingly takes a view opposite of Laurentin in the French original and omits Laurentin's own discussion of the question.

42 Marshall 1978: 70–71; Schweizer 1984: 29; Wiefel 1988: 53; Schulz, TDNT 7:400; Schweizer, TDNT 6:405; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.33.6.

53 Laurentin 1957a: 176–88 (this discussion is only in the French edition). The view is first attested in Gregory of Nyssa in A.D.. 386; PG 46:1140D–41A; R. Brown 1977: 304; and Delling, TDNT 5:834–35, esp. n.

55, who prefers to speak of a “virgin conception” as the most accurate way to describe Luke’s portrayal. Wiefel 1988: 53 refers to Ambrose, Expositio Evangelii Secundam Lucam 2 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 32:99), and Augustine, De Sancta Virginitate 4 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 41:327). For the full history of exegesis, see Graystone 1968: 3–36.

3 R. Brown 1977: 346–55; Wiefel 1988: 57; Farris 1985: 86–98; Fitzmyer 1981: 359–62; Jones 1968; Bemile 1986: 36. Fitzmyer, agreeing with Winter and Schneider, notes that the hymn is parallel to the psalms in 1 Maccabees, the Qumran Thanksgiving hymns, and the Qumran War Scroll. The hymn also resembles the OT hymns of praise (Ps. 33, 47, 48, 113, 135, 136; one could add to the list 1 Sam. 2:1–10; Jon. 2:2–9 [2:3–10 MT]; Isa. 38:9–20; Tob. 8:15–17; and Sir. 51:1–12). Fitzmyer (p. 359) regards 1:48 as a Lucan insert. In fact, he seems favorable to R. Brown’s position that the hymn emerged out of the Jewish-Christian community. Schneider 1977a: 56 sees a Hellenistic Jewish-Christian rewrite of Jewish material or a reworking by Luke himself; so also C. F. Evans 1990: 171–73.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen’s seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

17 Zerwick 1963: 85 §260; Wiefel 1988: 58. Nolland 1989: 69 also sees this as possible.

4 The most detailed recent survey of the issues is Farris 1985: 26–30. Other treatments include R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Fitzmyer 1981: 376–78; Marshall 1978: 86–87; Ernst 1977: 92–94; Wiefel 1988: 62–64; Nolland 1989: 82–85; and Schürmann 1969: 84–85, 88–89, 93–94.

34 Schürmann 1969: 91 n. 67; Hendriksen 1978: 131; Wiefel 1988: 65; BDF §400.6. Bovon 1989: 108 correctly states that John has a foot in each era, since as the last of the prophets of promise he sets the table for the new era (Luke 7:26; 16:16).

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

1 Wiefel 1988: 68–70 gives some background on Caesar Augustus. For an evaluation of the Lucan notes that place Luke within the sphere of ancient history writing, see Büchsel, TDNT 3:395–96, and Strathmann, TDNT 4:492 n. 53.

34 Wiefel 1988: 80. These texts show that God used women as revelatory agents. Several texts, including Luke 2:36–38, have audiences that include both men and women. There is no indication in the Bible that prophetesses had a gender-restricted audience. In fact, the recording of their prophecies for all to read suggests the opposite. On Luke and women, see Flanagan 1978: 292–93, who notes thirteen Lucan texts where man and woman are paralleled as Simeon and Anna are here; Nolland 1989: 122.

1 The view is old. Those who hold it include Bultmann 1963: 300; Creed 1930: 44; Klostermann 1929: 45; Schürmann 1969: 139; Schneider 1977a: 76; Wiefel 1988: 82; and Fitzmyer 1981: 435–36. About the only one who raises doubts is Marshall 1978: 126. Despite the remarks about sources, Coleridge 1993: 187–213 is certainly correct that from a narrative viewpoint this pericope could not be dropped without substantial loss to the infancy narrative. Jesus' remarks about himself are a fitting climax to the prologue. In Coleridge's words (p. 189), this unit is "the most important" of the infancy narrative.

18 Wiefel 1988: 84 n. 20. Bovon 1989: 159 notes that the idiom suggests the questioner's belief that an error has been made.

2 But Goulder 1989: 281–82 sees Luke drawing both on Matthew and to a lesser degree on Mark. Fitzmyer 1981: 479–80 lists five major differences between Mark and Luke: (1) Luke omits references to Jesus' coming from Galilee (Mark 1:9) or being baptized in the Jordan; (2) Luke does not name John (Mark 1:9); (3) Luke uniquely notes Jesus' prayer; (4) Luke has the heaven "open" versus being "rent" (Mark 1:10); and (5) only Luke notes that the Spirit descended "in bodily form" like a dove (with Matt. 3:16). Wiefel 1988: 94–95 notes that Luke uses the singular "heaven" instead of the Semitic plural "heavens."

9 Bovon 1989: 194 notes that the anaphoric use of the article with πνεῦμα in each Gospel argues for the age of the tradition; Bovon cites Jeremias 1980: 115; Deut. 8:2. On ἤγετο, see Wiefel 1988: 100. Paul has this expression: Rom. 8:14; Gal. 5:18.

26 Pesikta Rabbati 36.2 (= Braude 1968: 680–83); Kirk 1972: 95–98; Wiefel 1988: 102. However, the Jewish text is late and it speaks only of his standing on the roof of the temple.

15 So Fitzmyer 1981: 573 and Wiefel 1988: 116 rightly, against Conzelmann 1960: 43 and Schneider 1977a: 130, who see a reference to Judea, no doubt because of 4:44. Of course, if Judea is broadly understood in that verse, then Galilee is included in that earlier reference as well. See the exegesis of 4:44.

16 For this view are Schürmann 1969: 296; Hendriksen 1978: 309; Wiefel 1988: 121 (perhaps). Against it is Marshall 1978: 226. Bovon 1989: 261 thinks that any specific allusion to the cross or ascension is unlikely and prefers to refer only to the period of the church. The key terms are ἀπαρθῇ in Luke and two forms of αἴρω in Isa. 53.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

44 For more recent discussion, see Käser 1968; Schürmann 1969: 304 n. 29; Marshall 1978: 233; Fitzmyer 1981: 610 (who ties it to the apocryphal gospel tradition); Wiefel 1988: 123 (who rejects a connection to Jesus); and Bovon 1989: 267.

61 See also the Gospel of Thomas 45a. On σαπρός as "rotten," "useless," or "of no value," see Bauernfeind, TDNT 7:97; Wiefel 1988: 139; Eph. 4:29.

1 Since the passage is unique to Matthew and Luke, most speak of Q as the source or at least as one of the sources; Bovon 1989: 346–47; Wiefel 1988: 141–42.

4 Schürmann 1969: 395–96; Carson 1984: 200; Liefeld 1984: 897–98. Also noting four options is Busse 1979: 142 n. 3: (1) Luke added the detail, (2) Luke is truer to Q than is Matthew, (3) Luke had another source, and (4) Luke received a pre-Lucan expansion of Q. Busse cannot decide between views 1 and 4. Wiefel 1988: 142 opts for view 4.

6 For Q as the basic source, see Schürmann 1969: 413, 418; Marshall 1978: 287; Fitzmyer 1981: 662–63; Tiede 1988: 153; Wiefel 1988: 148; Bovon 1989: 369. Those who prefer Matthean priority argue that Luke used Matthew. Luke 7:20–21, 29–30 does not have a parallel in Matthew.

8 Schürmann 1969: 408 n. 8, 409 argues that John's question speaks of kingdom hope in general. John's question was, "Do you bring the kingdom and the promise of God?" This may be a correct way to view the question's force, but behind it must lie a messianic implication, when the other options are rejected. This may be why Marshall 1978: 290 speaks of a vague messianic expectation. Wiefel 1988: 149 notes two options for "Coming

One”: an allusion to Dan. 7:13 [Theodotion] with its apocalyptic judge or to Hab. 2:3, which at Qumran was used with apocalyptic, eschatological force. On Hab. 2:3, see Strobel 1961b: 265–77.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

8 Jeremias 1963a: 126, 132 opts for either a prostitute or a woman in a dishonorable vocation, by which he means either an immoral or a dishonest vocation; Jeremias 1969: 303–12; Fitzmyer 1981: 689; Black 1967: 181–83. Marshall 1978: 308 notes correctly that the sins seem to be hers, so that her reputation is not because of association with someone else; so also Wiefel 1988: 154, who thinks she is a prostitute, as does Schürmann 1969: 431 n. 8.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 696; SB 2:164; Wiefel 1988: 157–58. Grundmann 1963: 174 notes that women could not go into the synagogue or say the Shemaʿ. The late Tosepta text just cited gives the remark of a Jewish leader who rejoices that he is not a pagan, a woman, or unlearned. See also Leipoldt 1955: 69–114 and Witherington 1979.

3 Bovon 1989: 415 speaks of an antithetical word of wisdom. Bultmann 1963: 81–82, 98 calls the sayings “double-stranded” mĕšāllîm, like secular proverbs; also Fitzmyer 1981: 716. Berger 1984: 118 speaks of a warning word for 8:18. Wiefel 1988: 161 also speaks of a māšāl (parable), as does Jeremias 1963a: 41, but this is unlikely. Luke seems aware of the proverbial character by his reuse of the material.

4 So also Danker 1988: 179 (with a little hesitancy); Ellis 1974: 127. Fitzmyer 1981: 725 rightly rejects this view, as do Schürmann 1969: 470 n. 197; Marshall 1978: 332; and Wiefel 1988: 162.

1 This miracle cluster is paralleled in Mark 4:35–5:43; Marshall 1978: 332–33; Fitzmyer 1981: 726–27; Tiede 1988: 170; Wiefel 1988: 163 n. 1.

6 That Matthew may have accompanied Jesus lends credence to the added detail of the second demoniac. The extent of the agreement between Mark and Luke leads most to see Mark as the source for Luke; so Schürmann 1969: 487; Schramm 1971: 90; Marshall 1978: 335; Fitzmyer 1981: 733; Wiefel 1988: 165–66. Bovon 1989: 432 is so impressed with these agreements that he argues that this account stands against the two-Gospel (or Griesbach) hypothesis. What could have caused Luke to go his own way against Matthew?

2 Wiefel 1988: 170 speaks of Jesus' person and his mysterious suffering as the key to the unit. Schürmann 1969: 498 speaks of the mystery of God's reign becoming evident to the disciples. Bovon 1989: 455 notes points of contact shared with Acts: (1) reception of power from the Lord (Acts 26:15–18), (2) the juxtaposition of preaching and healing (3:1–26), and (3) mission that finds acceptance and rejection (13:51; 18:6).

1 On the options, see Luce 1933: 186 and Schneider 1977a: 215. Fitzmyer 1981: 791–92 sees Luke's rewriting Mark, as do Schürmann 1969: 563–64; Wiefel 1988: 179; and Neirynck 1973. Plummer 1896: 250 notes signs of Lucan expression in the account. Schweizer 1984: 159 seems to suggest the presence of an additional source, noting the different dating, the journey idea, and the reference to “the” mountain. So also Schramm 1971: 136–39 argues for an additional source, as does Bovon 1989: 488–89, especially for 9:31–33. Bovon even mentions the possibility of oral tradition. Marshall 1978: 381 notes the Lucan peculiarities: Jesus at prayer, change in his facial appearance, exodus, sleep of the disciples, and fear at the cloud’s coming. Marshall, like Bovon, suggests that Luke reworked Mark in light of oral sources, since some changes are shared with Matthew (i.e., the facial appearance).

2 Because the exact list of names is so uncertain and because Luke says nothing about the structure, one should be cautious about invoking such precise symbolism. Wiefel 1988: 97 seems to regard this twelfth-week view as possible. Schürmann 1969: 203 n. 119 argues that if it is present Luke is not conscious of it. Nolland 1989: 168 suggests that it was the point of Luke’s source, whose order he reversed. But how can one know this? Goulder 1989: 284–85 is strongly supportive of this view, citing 1 Enoch 93.3–10 to stress that the form is to some extent artificial.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

34 BAGD 883, BAA 1762, and esp. Fitzmyer 1985: 853 discusses the uncertainty about Chorazin's exact location: either two to three miles north of Capernaum at Khirbet Karazeh (R. W. Smith in ABD 1:912) or a site on Lake Gennesaret. Wiefel 1988: 198–99 prefers the location near Capernaum, as does Manson 1949: 77. Manson also notes that Bethsaida is on the east side of the Jordan near its entry into the Sea of Galilee, about five miles from Capernaum.

59 This is why K. Aland (in Metzger 1975: 151) is certain that seventy-two was original. Wiefel 1988: 195 asks if seventy is not an attempt to get a round number.

62 The RSV and NRSV read seventy; see also Schweizer 1984: 174; Danker 1988: 212 (who attributes the number seventy-two to Moses' addition of two elders when he appointed his seventy [Num. 11:26] and sees Gentile symbolism in the choice); Tiede 1988: 200–201; Ellis 1974: 155–56; C. F. Evans 1990: 444–45; Schürmann 1994: 54. The NIV reads seventy-two; also Manson 1949: 74; Liefeld 1984: 940; Hendriksen 1978: 570–71 ("leans" this way); Creed 1930: 144; Arndt 1956: 280; Ernst 1977: 331; Marshall 1978: 414–15 (who has a good summary of the issue); Fitzmyer 1985: 845–46; Wiefel 1988: 195; C. A. Evans 1990: 172; Nolland 1993a: 546. Those who are undecided include Luce 1933: 198–99; Plummer 1896: 272; and Schneider 1977a: 235 (who argues that a decision is less than certain).

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus’ intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark’s account and does not testify to a separate event.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis's); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar's view of these details parallels many critics.

5 Marshall 1978: 455 sees either two versions or Matthew's adding to an original short edition like that in Luke. These reflect distinct recensions of Q; but he does not discuss the number of events. Jeremias 1971a: 193–96 argues for the originality of the Lucan form and posits an Aramaic form behind it. He regards its structure as memorable in an oral context, carrying rhyme and a two-four rhythm (so also Meier 1994: 293). Beasley-Murray 1986: 147 argues that Luke's version is original in extent, but that Matthew's is closer to the original wording, a view close to Nolland's (noted above). For him Luke's prayer circulated in Gentile Christian circles, while Matthew's was the Jewish-Christian version. Nevertheless, for him the prayer's roots go back to Jesus. Wiefel 1988: 215 is less certain of this attempt to distinguish communities.

1 Marshall 1978: 491–93 sees different recensions of Q. Manson 1949: 96 sees most of Matt. 23 coming from a special Matthean source. Ellis 1974: 170 and Schlatter 1960: 303–5 see a combination of Q and special

Lucan material. But Wiefel 1988: 227 objects to this because of the material's similarity to Matt. 23.

8 On the coin, see BAGD 117; BAA 235; Matt. 10:29 (the only other NT use). Wiefel 1988: 233 puts its worth at five pfennigs, one of the smallest German coins. A denarius was a day's wage, so this is very little money. The most basic worker would earn this in roughly a half hour. The term for sparrow (στρουθίον) may also indicate simply a "little bird"; Plummer 1896: 319–20; Ps. 11:1 [10:1 LXX]; 84:3 [83:4 LXX]; MM 594; Bauernfeind, TDNT 7:730, 732 n. 19; Fitzmyer 1985: 960.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: "One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, 'I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!' he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies." 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: "Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, 'We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.' / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse" (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85:

1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‘a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to “acts of mercy”; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, “My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures.” The object of the last clause is not clear (“for heaven,” “of benefits,” “of souls,” or “for myself in the world to come”), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

10 Manson 1949: 114 regards the material as coming from distinct sources, as does Grundmann 1963: 262, though they differ as to which sources and give no reasons. Marshall 1978: 531 argues for the same source, but the distinct wording is a difficulty for that view. Fitzmyer 1985: 981 argues that 12:33a is Lucan and cites 11:41 for support, but that verse is figurative for one’s life and is not similar enough to argue that Luke created this saying. In addition, Fitzmyer argues that Luke abridged Matthew’s saying, but this cannot explain entirely the distinct terminology. Wiefel 1988: 241 sees Q and special L material here that Luke combined to answer the point made in 12:21.

3 Luce 1933: 233; Manson 1949: 117–18; and Schneider 1977a: 288 say that the basic source is Q, while 12:47–48 is L. Tiede 1988: 238–42 and Marshall 1978: 533 see all but 12:41, 47–48 as coming from Q. Ellis 1974:

180 is undecided. Godet 1875: 2.106, 110–11 sees Luke and Matthew using different portions of the same tradition. Grundmann 1963: 264; Fitzmyer 1985: 984–85; and Wiefel 1988: 242, 244 regard the unique material as coming from Luke's special source, while the parable is a mix of Q (12:39–40, 42b–46) and L (12:35–38 for Grundmann and Fitzmyer; 12:36, 37a, 38 for Wiefel). These three treat 12:41–42a and 12:47–48 as Lucan additions. Grundmann defends the remark's authenticity as involving an original warning that included the Pharisees. A Matthean prioritist sees Matthew where others have Q, though the issue of Luke's placement of this pericope is more of a problem for the Two-Gospel hypothesis, than for a sayings source such as Q. Why did Luke change the location if he had Matthew? The possibility of other sources cannot be ruled out. The views on sources for this pericope are complex, but most see Luke bringing two sets of images together (12:35–38 and 12:42–46). For full discussions, see Weiser 1971: 161–225; Schneider 1975: 20–27; and D. Wenham 1984: 15–100. Wenham's work is part of a larger hypothesis on a pre-Synoptic form of Jesus' eschatological teaching, a view that traces substantial portions of this material back to Jesus, including 12:41, 44, 47–48, which others deny have such roots.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2

Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression "Palestinian."

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

3 For the presence of these verses in Q are Schneider 1977a: 324–25 and Wiefel 1988: 282. Fitzmyer 1985: 1073 sees 15:4–6 in Q and 15:8–9 in L. Other parallels are found in the Gospel of Thomas 107 and the Gnostic Gospel of Truth 31.35–32.9.

3 For Luke having Q's original order and not Matthew, see Manson 1949: 134; Fitzmyer 1985: 1114; Schneider 1977a: 337 (perhaps); Meier 1994: 157; and Marshall 1978: 627. Ernst 1977: 469 speaks of Q material, special Lucan material, and Lucan redaction. Wiefel 1988: 294 speaks of Q in 16:16–17 and of Mark in 16:18. Godet 1875: 2.173 prefers Luke's positioning of material to Matthew's. However, the warnings are so general that parallel traditions may exist, reflecting a variety of settings.

4 Mark also lacks the exception; Wiefel 1988: 294 therefore speaks of Mark as Luke's source. The variation in the tradition is what causes the Jesus Seminar's uncertainty about the saying. But only the exception should be a topic for such a discussion. Against a Matthean redaction is the probable Semitic background to the exception as stated in Matt. 5:32 (noted in Nolland 1993a: 816, although curiously he sees the detail as a redactional addition).

2 So Wiefel 1988: 305 and Bruners 1977. Bruners also argues that the account is Lucan. Fitzmyer 1985: 1150–51 and H. Betz 1981 question the connection. At most, it is a form parallel. Betz's main thesis (1971) that the account is a polemic against healing miracles is incorrect; see Marshall 1978: 649. Meier 1994: 750–51 shows how an appeal to Lucan creation from 2 Kings cannot explain four differences in the account: (1) no mention of Elijah, (2) no mention of Jesus as prophet, (3) no delay in the miracle's occurrence, and (4) the different kind of miracle in the account (punitive versus healing).

14 Plummer 1896: 75 cites H. B. Tristram. Wight 1953: 121 also mentions a split travel custom of children spending time with kin and neighbors, but without citing ancient evidence.

29 So Stählin, TDNT 3:154; Wilckens, TDNT 7:516; Liefeld 1984: 901–2; Plummer 1896: 207; Jeremias 1963a: 162; Marshall 1978: 301; Ernst 1977: 353; Tiede 1988: 158; Bovon 1989: 180; Wiefel 1988: 151; and Linton 1975–76. Nolland 1989: 344 also notes the possibility of an allusion to a real game here, regardless of which view is taken, citing work by Légasse 1969: 299–301.

21 Wilckens, TDNT 8:566–67, notes that ὑποκριτής is always a negative address in the NT: in Matthew fourteen times (seven of which are in Matt. 23); elsewhere only four times (Luke 6:42; here; 13:15; Mark 7:6).

14 On the syntax of τοῦ πιστεύειν ἐπί (to believe), see BAGD 287 §II.1bγ; BAA 582 §II.1bγ; BDR §187.2.2; §400.8.10; Acts 5:14; 9:42; 18:8; 16:31; 22:19; Rom. 9:33; 10:11; 1 Tim. 1:16; 1 Pet. 2:6. Wilcox 1965: 85–86 argues that this is possibly a Semitic construction.

20 Windisch, TDNT 1:496–99, gives a description of how involved these greetings could be: hugs, kisses, and news were often exchanged.

25 Windisch, TDNT 1:499 n. 23, argues that the Spirit is meant here, citing Num. 11:25–26; Isa. 11:2; and 1 Pet. 4:14. Although the Spirit is related to the provision of blessing, at this point in Luke–Acts it is too early to see a direct reference, since the abiding Spirit is not bestowed until Acts 2.

4 On leaven as an evil disposition in Judaism, see SB 1:728–29; Windisch, TDNT 2:905–6; Manson 1949: 270.

1 So Marshall 1978: 132; Marshall 1970: 145–46; Bovon 1989: 165 (who sees John as a "bridge" figure); Wink 1968: 42–86. Other Lucan texts on the Baptist are Luke 7:18–35; Acts 1:5, 22; 10:37; 11:16; 13:24–25; 19:3–4.

43 Luke 7:11–17; 17:12–19; Wink 1968: 44; Jeremias, TDNT 2:928–41; France 1971: 48.

70 So Winter 1955; also mentioned by older commentators such as Luce 1933: 86 and Alford 1874: 446.

3 R. Brown 1977: 346–55; Wiefel 1988: 57; Farris 1985: 86–98; Fitzmyer 1981: 359–62; Jones 1968; Bemile 1986: 36. Fitzmyer, agreeing with Winter and Schneider, notes that the hymn is parallel to the psalms in 1 Maccabees, the Qumran Thanksgiving hymns, and the Qumran War Scroll. The hymn also resembles the OT hymns of praise (Ps. 33, 47, 48, 113, 135, 136; one could add to the list 1 Sam. 2:1–10; Jon. 2:2–9 [2:3–10 MT]; Isa. 38:9–20; Tob. 8:15–17; and Sir. 51:1–12). Fitzmyer (p. 359) regards 1:48 as a Lucan insert. In fact, he seems favorable to R. Brown's position that the hymn emerged out of the Jewish-Christian community. Schneider 1977a: 56

sees a Hellenistic Jewish-Christian rewrite of Jewish material or a reworking by Luke himself; so also C. F. Evans 1990: 171–73.

7 Among the hypotheses are the following:

	Added to	Adherents
1:76–79	Jewish or Jewish-Christian hymn	Winter 1956: 239 n. 41
1:76 or 1:76–77	early Christian hymn	Benoit 1956–57: 182–91
1:68–75	Christian hymn	Schürmann 1969: 88–90
1:76–77, 79b	Baptist hymn	Hahn 1969: 242–43, 365–66
1:76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn of the Anawim	R. Brown 1977: 377–78; Farris 1985: 27–28
1:70, 76–77	Jewish-Christian hymn probably from the Anawim	Fitzmyer 1981: 378

16 Besides those already cited, other major works on Jesus' trial are Bammel 1970, Blinzler 1969, Sherwin-White 1963: 24–47, and Winter 1974. Catchpole, Blinzler, and Sherwin-White defend the historicity of much of the Lucan account. Fitzmyer 1985: 1466 also thinks a morning trial is most likely.

5 Bovon 1989: 179 n. 65. He notes Isa. 64:1 [63:19 MT]; T. Levi 18.6–7. One could add 3 Macc. 6:18; 2 Bar. 22.1; Traub, TDNT 5:530 n. 263. Also seeing the presence of apocalyptic elements is Witherington 1990: 149, who compares the text to Rev. 1 and defends the event's authenticity as a vision.

40 Van Der Loos 1965: 78–79, 110–13 notes that not all disease is possession nor is all possession disease. On the distinction between miracles and magic, see Witherington 1990: 156–60; on Luke's antimagic polemic, see Garrett 1989, who defers from answering any historical questions, staying at the literary level.

17 On the role of purity in Judaism as a stage on the way to holiness, see Neusner and Chilton 1991; *m. Soṭa*9.15. On the Pharisees' concern for purity, see Witherington 1990: 56–59, who speaks in particular of the ḥăbērîm, the overly strict Pharisees.

25 For a defense of the Pharisees' likely presence in Galilee, see Witherington 1990: 61–66.

29 Liefeld 1984: 887. Similar examples existed in Judaism, such as the priority of giving birth or burying the dead versus staying ceremonially clean. Witherington 1990: 68 speaks of the Sabbath's being a day of renewal and restoration, so that eating a meal is quite appropriate.

7 Rom. 11 sees a clear future for Israel and a future role in God's plan; Burns 1992. They will be grafted into the vine again one day. For another set of arguments against this Israel-church connection, see Witherington

1990: 128–29, who also notes that the Twelve were called to help gather a community.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

38 If one source is present, this is the likely cause of the difference. For a view that places redaction with Luke, see Witherington 1990: 49.

3 Fitzmyer 1981: 696; SB 2:164; Wiefel 1988: 157–58. Grundmann 1963: 174 notes that women could not go into the synagogue or say the Shema‘. The late Tosepta text just cited gives the remark of a Jewish leader who rejoices that he is not a pagan, a woman, or unlearned. See also Leipoldt 1955: 69–114 and Witherington 1979.

10 Talbert 1982: 92–93; Witherington 1979. On the escalated role of women in the later Jewish synagogue, see Brooten 1982.

12 Bultmann 1963: 112 also rejects its historicity since it views Jesus' work as past and speaks of the possible exaltation of Capernaum to heaven. Neither of these reasons has merit. Mission failure certainly did occur in Jesus' ministry—why else did he meet with crucifixion? On the possibility of cities being exalted before God, one need think only of the imagery of the OT prophets, where Israel is exalted above its foes. Berger 1984: 200, 205, speaks of woes of warning. For the woe oracle form, see Amos 6:1–7;

Mic. 2:1; Hab. 2:6–7; Zeph. 2:5. Witherington 1990: 166 defends their authenticity, along with Matthew's mention of Chorazin, which is not mentioned outside of these parallel passages.

15 This view has been qualified recently by Barr 1988; see Witherington 1990: 217–18 for an evaluation of Barr's critique. On relating to God as a child does to a parent, see Luke 18:15–17; Dunn 1975: 23. R. Brown 1994: 172–75 has a full discussion of ›abbā‹.

3 Witherington 1990: 121 gives two reasons why 12:49–53 is unlikely to be a church creation: the baptism mentioned here is not water baptism and the saying suggests a historical limitation on Jesus.

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

2 Catchpole 1984 argues against historicity on form-critical grounds. For a response, see Witherington 1990: 104–7 and Nolland 1993b: 922–23. Holding to historicity, Kinman 1993 argues for a contrast between this event and Greco-Roman entries of dignitaries. Kinman also argues that Luke tries to show Jesus as a "king like Solomon" who is not a political threat and thus seeks to blunt the charge that Christians are a political threat to Rome. As such, Luke declares the significance to the event by how he tells the whole story of Jesus.

4 For the options on how to take this act in light of the Synoptics and John's Gospel, see Witherington 1990: 113–15, who appeals to John 2:16; Zech. 14:21; and Neh. 13:4–9, 12–13 to see both a prophetic and messianic

(but not revolutionary) cleansing. He argues that it was the act of an individual and was seen as symbolic of a need for national repentance, not the rejection of the nation. Witherington also argues that Jesus does not have a Davidic expectation (like that expressed in Ps. Sol. 17). True, Jesus does not yet function like the warrior in the Psalms of Solomon, but he will, as his remarks at his trial show. This is one reason why, when some speak of the Christ, Jesus replies in terms of the judging Son of Man, just as he did at his trial. For the cleansing as messianic act, see Hamilton 1964.

5 The temple area was large (over 100 yards by 150 yards), so if Jesus acted quickly, there may have been little time to react. In addition, he may have intended only a prophetic sign, not a comprehensive cleansing. A brief symbolic action may have sufficed to express his intent, as even E. Sanders 1985: 70 acknowledges. Witherington 1990: 109–10 notes six historical questions that influence this passage and argue for its plausibility. One of the most basic is, Why invent such an event? Nolland 1993b: 935–36 notes nine views on this issue and opts for a modest, symbolic action against long-standing temple practice (pace Eppstein 1964) that thwarted true worship and called for purification, if not temple replacement.

17 For defense of the statement's authenticity, see Witherington 1990: 140–41. It is hard to imagine the church's inventing a saying like this where Judas is present.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon

1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

43 Among those who support this approach are Schürmann 1969: 302; Vogt 1959; Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; and apparently Danker 1988: 130. Marshall 1978: 230 is uncertain of the origin.

16 Fitzmyer 1981: 690 and Marshall 1978: 311 mention that no specific verb for "to thank" exists in Aramaic or Hebrew. Thus, the sense of ἀγαπάω is something like that in Ps. 116:1 [114:1 LXX] or Josephus, Jewish War 1.10.2 §198. See Wood 1954–55 and Jeremias 1963a: 126–27. Fitzmyer adds that in 1QH the Hebrew verb for praise (הוֹדָה, hôdâ) is constantly used to express thanks. What is present is gratitude that also expresses appreciation and love.

1 For the major essays on this theme, see Tuckett 1983, especially the critique of Wrede by Dunn (pp. 116–31, originally Dunn 1970b), who also sees the historical roots of the secret residing in Jesus' ministry.

16 The image of the sheep on the shoulder is common in the ancient world; Fitzmyer 1985: 1077; G. Wright 1939; V. Muller 1944.

47 The relationship between Mary and Elizabeth is not specified. Wycliffe seems to be responsible for associating the two as cousins; Plummer 1896: 25; R. Brown 1977: 292. On the problem of a supposed contradiction between John and Jesus as relatives and the statements of John 1:31, 33, see the additional note on 1:25.

21 The difference may suggest a distinct form of the tradition for Luke, since the Spirit's work is a Lucan emphasis. Schulz 1972: 205 and Manson

1949: 86 argue that Matthew probably changed the reference to the Spirit, possibly in light of Matt. 12:18. But the reason for such a change is not entirely compelling, since Matthew also loves OT allusions. However, if there is a change here, Matthew is more likely to have made it, since it is hard to see Luke's removing a reference to the Spirit for explanatory reasons (but so argue Wall 1987 and Goulder 1989: 504, noting that Luke does not use the phrase Spirit of God). For a Lucan change are Hamerton-Kelly 1964–65; Yates 1964; and Nolland 1993a: 639–40. Nolland notes that Luke alone uses anthropomorphisms like "hand of God" (1:66) and "arm of God" (1:51).

12 Tertullian, On Modesty 11, identifies the woman in Luke 7:36–50 with the one in Matt. 26:6–13. Gregory the Great identifies the sinful woman with Mary Magdalene (Zahn 1920: 330–32 n. 33 lists the ancient texts). Ephraem the Syrian (On the Sinful Woman; On Our Lord 47) equates Magdalene, Mary of Bethany, and the woman of Luke 7—taking the error one step further.

4 Klostermann 1929: 118 and Egelkraut 1976: 85–90 favor a Lucan reworking of Mark. Schneider 1977a: 247 and Wiefel 1988: 207 see an independent source for the parable and Luke 10:25–28 using Mark. Bultmann 1963: 51; Luce 1933: 204 (citing Q); and Daube 1956: 247–50 see a version like that in Matthew. Zahn 1920: 427; Manson 1949: 259–61; and Jeremias 1963a: 202 see independent incidents or sources. Plummer 1896: 283 calls the possibility of one incident precarious, but not impossible. Fitzmyer 1985: 877–78 clearly ascribes the material to a special Lucan source, but sees only one incident, a distinction that seems hard to insist upon. Marshall 1978: 441 also leans toward two incidents, as do Hendriksen 1978: 591; Liefeld 1984: 942; and Blomberg 1990: 230–31, who speaks of “proem midrash” here. Ellis 1974: 159, though noting that two incidents are probable, regards the exchange as set in Jerusalem, which is possible, since the next account is in Bethany. Grundmann 1963: 221–22 speaks only of an independent source with the parable coming from L, while Ernst 1977: 344–46 leans this way, clearly noting that the parable is from special Lucan material. Nolland 1993a: 580 argues for an original link of neighbor and the parable, but that Luke is responsible for placing the great-commandment discussion here, drawing on Mark 12:28–34. Schürmann 1994: 136–40, 149–50 sees the parable emerging from L material and rooted in Jesus’ intention, but 10:25–28 is probably rooted in Mark’s account and does not testify to a separate event.

1 Ellis 1974: 163–64 attributes the original context to Luke, a view that is possible only if the Sermon on the Mount is a Matthean topical sermon (which, though possible, is not likely). In favor of one occasion or point of origin are Manson 1949: 265; Godet 1875: 2.47; Zahn 1920: 448–49 (favoring a view like Ellis’s); Schneider 1977a: 256; and Wiefel 1988: 215. A good summary of recent discussion may be found in Meier 1994: 291–93, 353–57. Meier sees Luke as reflecting the original size and structure of the prayer, with Matthew expanding the petitions and Luke altering some wording. But unlike many, he sees two versions in circulation. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 325–27) sees Q as the source, with Matthew making additions and Luke introducing some changes in vocabulary. The seminar’s view of these details parallels many critics.

4 Zahn 1920: 477–78 n. 73 sees an independent tradition from Matthew, but Zahn is less clear if the material of the various passages is essentially the same discourse.

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

17 Zerwick 1963: 85 §260; Wiefel 1988: 58. Nolland 1989: 69 also sees this as possible.

46 Marshall 1978: 430 notes that the rhetorical remark is not a denial or a rebuke about their joy over their authority; it is a comparative idea. Knowing God, or better, being known by him, is a more important source of joy; Zerwick 1963: §445.

7 Ἔγνων is a dramatic use of the aorist: "I have determined what I will do," which might be idiomatically rendered, "I've got it!" (Kistemaker 1980: 230–31; Burton 1900: §45; Zerwick 1963: §258). The asyndeton in the verse suggests that the idea came to him suddenly; Plummer 1896: 383.

41 This key term links 16:9 and 16:11. In this context, ἀδικία is a Hebraistic "genitive of quality," describing the steward's character; Zerwick 1963: §40; Büchsel, TDNT 3:943 n. 2 (for κριτής). Schrenk, TDNT 1:157, calls it a "genitive of definition."

4 On the impersonal use of the third-person plural, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 and Zerwick 1963: §1. The imperfect in this context vividly portrays ongoing action by many: "They were bringing."

9 Luke has almost two-thirds of the NT uses of ἀπαγγέλλω: eleven times in his Gospel (7:18, 22; 8:20, 34, 36, 47; 9:36; 13:1; 14:21; 18:37; 24:9), fifteen times in Acts, and nineteen times in the rest of the NT; BAGD 79; BAA 157. On the grammar, see Zerwick 1963: §1.

4 F. E. D. Schleiermacher also held this view. On the history of interpretation, see Thiessen 1934; Weinert 1977: 505; and Zerwick 1959.

17 Laurentin 1967: 75–82, who also cites S. Lyonnet as holding this view. Note also the remark of Zimmerli, TDNT 9:367 n. 66.

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

10 On mourners, see m. Meg. 4.3; Danby 1933: 206 nn. 9–10. M. Ketub. 4.4 argues that a minimum of two flutes and one wailing woman should be present; also Ṣemaḥot 12.5 (= Zlotnick 1966: 81). T. Judah 26.3 protests against too much extravagance in the funeral procession for Judah.

1 Jeremias 1980: 266 argues that ἐντὸς ὑμῶν (in your midst) in 17:21 is not Lucan. Whether Luke worded the introduction is an open question. After a detailed presentation of the options, Zmijewski 1972: 387–90 decides for a special Lucan source.

8 Conzelmann 1960: 105 n. 3, 123 suggests that this speech is the "insider" explanation for Jesus' remarks. So also Zmijewski 1972: 417–19, although he acknowledges the possibility of a special Lucan source. Against a Lucan redaction are Kümmel 1957: 29; Colpe, TDNT 8:450–51; and Marshall 1978: 659, who notes that Luke does not create Son-of-Man sayings and that the text has a good claim to authenticity. In addition, the criterion of multiple attestation favors authenticity.

20 Some regard ἀποκαλύπτω as conceptually equal to Matthew's παρουσία (parousia). The noun ἀποκάλυψις (revelation) does have an eschatological force; 1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thess. 1:7–8; 1 Pet. 1:7, 13; 4:13; Zmijewski 1972: 442 n. 50.

24 Cf. εὑρίσκω (to find) in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25 and σῴζω (to save) in Luke 9:24 = Mark 8:35. Geiger 1972: 121 speaks of the influence of Ezek. 13:18–19 (which uses περιποιέω), and Zmijewski 1976: 479 n. 56 sees a connection to Exod. 1:17 (which uses ζῳογονέω). Neither LXX reference satisfies, however, since each has only one element of Luke 17:33, and one can hardly argue for a double LXX allusion. In addition, if the LXX alteration is based on an earlier, existing traditional saying, what does it add? Περιποιέω appears only three times in the NT (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13) and the noun περιποίησις is never used in the Gospels (five times elsewhere). Since the conscious shift of terminology appears to have no point, the rare terminology is probably from a source.

28 For description of the millstone, see the exegesis of 17:2 (cf. Exod. 11:5; Isa. 47:2; Zmijewski 1972: 496).

18 Fitzmyer follows Conzelmann 1960: 126; but correctly Marshall 1978: 762. Danker 1988: 329 notes that the issues of Jerusalem's destruction and the end-time were linked in most people's minds; one suggests the other. Jesus' answer goes beyond the temple. Zmijewski 1972: 93–95 suggests that the reference to the "coming days" in 21:6 suggests an eschatological setting, since ἡμέρα (day) alludes to the day of the Lord. It must be remembered that any judgment that consumed Jerusalem would be seen as catastrophic, so either event—Jerusalem's fall or the temple's removal—would suggest severe judgment. The disciples are asking, "When will that judgment come?"

50 Luke often emphasizes prayer for the disciple: δέομαι in Luke 5:12; 8:38; 9:38, 40; 22:32; Acts 4:31; 8:22, 24; and προσεύχομαι in Luke 1:10; 3:21; 5:16; 6:12; 11:1 [twice]; 18:1; Acts 1:24; 8:15; Zmijewski 1972: 289. Constant prayer is called for at Luke 18:1, 7–8; Rom. 12:12; and 1 Thess. 5:17.

49 Ἀγρυπνέω occurs elsewhere in the NT at Mark 13:33; Eph. 6:18; Heb. 13:17; BAGD 14; BAA 24. The usual NT term for this concept is γρηγορέω (to watch); BAGD 167; BAA 334; e.g., Matt. 26:41; 1 Thess. 5:6; cf. 1 Pet. 4:7; 1 Esdr. 8:58 LXX [= 8:59 NRSV]; Luke 8:13; 22:40, 46.

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 1474 and Delling, TDNT 6:279, note that twenty-four uses of πλῆθος (company) are in Luke–Acts, with only one in Mark and none in Matthew. The combination ἅπαν (or πᾶν) τὸ πλῆθος (the whole company) is found in Luke 1:10; 8:37; 19:37; Acts 15:12; 25:24; Marshall 1978: 852. The idea of leading Jesus to Pilate shows the use of ἄγω for taking a criminal somewhere (Matt. 10:18; Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §303; BAGD 14 §2; BAA 25 §2).

9 Ἀγωνίζομαι suggests intense effort or straining labor; BAGD 15; BAA 27. With the present tense it contextually denotes continual striving. This is the only use of the word in the Synoptics; elsewhere at John 18:36; 1 Cor. 9:25; Col. 1:29; 4:12; 1 Tim. 4:10; 6:12; 2 Tim. 4:7. It is a term of Hellenistic, Jewish, and early Christian exhortation; Nolland 1993a: 733; Hoffmann 1967: 196.

26 Ἄδικος normally means “unjust” (BAGD 18; BAA 33); when opposite the term πιστός (faithful), it means “unfaithful.” Ἐλάχιστος indicates faithfulness in the “smallest” thing. But the comparison is general; so the sense is “small,” since the term is in parallelism to πολύς (much).

29 Either ἀδίκῳ μαμωνᾷ means “worldly wealth” or it is an exhortation to be a good steward of money gained dishonestly—an impossible sense. There is a pattern in these applications: stewardship (16:8b), money (16:9), stewardship (16:10), money (16:11), and stewardship and money (16:12–13).

29 On ἀετός, see Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12; Job 39:27; Matt. 24:28; BAGD 19; BAA 36; Marshall 1978: 669. Ἀετός can refer to an eagle, but not here, since eagles do not seek out dead meat; Rev. 12:14; 4:7; 8:13; Arndt 1956: 376. Attempts to interpret ἀετός as eagle, recalling the Roman emblem that accompanied the invasion of Jerusalem, assume a post–a.d. 70 date for Luke, as well as suggest an image contextually distant from the metaphor here; but so Danker 1988: 294; Leaney 1958: 232; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1173 (with less certainty).

15 Ἀκολουθέω is the standard verb for following in discipleship; BAGD 31 §3; BAA 60 §3; Luke 5:11 (of Peter, James, and John’s leaving all); Mark 1:18; 8:34; 2:14 = Luke 5:27–28.

19 For βοάω (to cry out), see BAGD 144; BAA 288 §1d; Stauffer, TDNT 1:625–26; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 3:3 = Mark 1:3 = Luke 3:4 = John 1:23; Mark 15:34 (= Matt. 27:46 [ἀναβοάω]); Luke 9:38; 18:7, 38; Acts

8:7; 17:6; 25:24; Gal. 4:27. In the LXX at Gen. 4:10; Judg. 10:10 (B); Num. 20:16 (ἀναβοάω). Rev. 6:9–11 is conceptually similar.

5 Jeremias 1971a: 187 argues that the verb ἀναγινώσκω renders Semitic קרא (qr,) and means "to recite," so that Jesus is calling for a specific text. Derrett 1970: 224 n. 1 notes that this view goes back to J. B. Lightfoot.

31 In 1 Cor. 7:26 ἀνάγκη (distress) has a generalized eschatological force of drawing close to the end (BAGD 52 §2; BAA 102 §2), which equals the generalized description of desolation in Luke 21:20 (in 2 Cor. 6:4 and 12:10, ἀνάγκη lacks any eschatological force). The other term, ὀργή, often refers to divine wrath (BAGD 579 §2b; BAA 1173 §2b) and conceptually recalls Deut. 28:58–68, a covenantal curse passage (the phrase all the nations in Deut. 28:64 may recall the phrase to all the nations in Luke 21:24). See also Isa. 9:12 [9:11 MT]; Jer. 4:4; Ezek. 5:13; 30:3; 32:9; Rom. 2:8; 12:19; Eph. 2:3; 5:6; Col. 3:6; 1 Thess. 1:10; 5:9; Rev. 6:16, 17; 11:18; 14:10; 16:19; 19:15.

15 Egelkraut 1976: 143, esp. n. 1; Miyoshi 1974: 59–61. For example, μετὰ ταῦτα occurs nine times in Luke–Acts, but not at all in Matthew and Mark (unless one counts the textually uncertain Mark 16:12). The use of ὁ κύριος (the Lord) in narrative introductions is Lucan; see the exegesis of Luke 2:11. The verb ἀναδείκνυμι (to appoint) appears only here and in Acts 1:24; Schlier, TDNT 2:30.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

7 Ἀναλύσῃ is unusual since in Classical Greek ἀναλύω normally means "to loose." This is the only NT occurrence with the meaning "return," although it has this meaning in the LXX: Tob. 2:9; 2 Macc. 8:25; 12:7; 15:28; Wis. 2:1 (BAGD 57 §2; BAA 113 §2). The subjunctive mood with the adverb πότε (when) refers to the unspecified hour of his return: "whenever he 'might break loose' from the wedding"; BAGD 695; BAA 1393.

12 Ἀνάπειρος probably describes the severely maimed or mutilated (BAGD 59; BAA 117; LSJ 116; elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 14:21), as opposed to χωλός, which refers to all the lame (BAGD 889; BAA 1772; Plummer 1896: 359).

38 Luke 18:33; 24:7, 46; Acts 10:41; 17:3; BAGD 70; BAA 138–39. The related noun ἀνάστασις (resurrection) is used of Jesus in Acts 1:22; 2:31; 4:2, 33; 17:18, 32; 26:23; BAGD 60; BAA 119–20.

19 Ἀνίστημι (BAGD 70; BAA 138–39) can mean "to erect, to bring on the scene"; here it means "to raise from the dead" (Luke 16:31; 18:33; 24:7; Acts 2:24, 32; 3:22; 10:41; 13:34; 17:3, 31).

10 Ἀνορθόω is limited to OT quotations in its other NT uses: Acts 15:16; Heb. 12:12; Creed 1930: 183; Klostermann 1929: 145. It was used commonly in medical situations; LSJ 147.

4 Παρῆσαν (arrived), from πάρειμι (to arrive; BAGD 624 §1a; BAA 1261 §1), refers to the crowd's arrival, not only its presence as many translations suggest; so correctly Plummer 1896: 337; Acts 10:21; 12:20;

17:6; 24:19, Marshall 1978: 553. In addition, ἀπαγγέλλω (to announce) usually refers to recent news; Marshall 1978: 553; Matt. 2:8; 28:8, 11; Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; Mark 16:10, 13; Luke 7:18; BAGD 79; BAA 157.

9 Luke has almost two-thirds of the NT uses of ἀπαγγέλλω: eleven times in his Gospel (7:18, 22; 8:20, 34, 36, 47; 9:36; 13:1; 14:21; 18:37; 24:9), fifteen times in Acts, and nineteen times in the rest of the NT; BAGD 79; BAA 157. On the grammar, see Zerwick 1963: §1.

25 So ἀπέλαβες means "you have received." BAGD 94 and BAA 189 note that ἀπολαμβάνω has a commercial sense here: the rich man is "paid up." The sense equals that of ἀπέχω (to receive) in 6:24.

8 The more intensive ἀποκρύπτω (to conceal) is used in contrast to unveiling (ἀποκαλύπτω) revelation and the mystery of God's plan (Luke 10:21; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). Luke uses the synonymous παρακαλύπτω (to conceal) in Luke 9:45 and κρύπτω (to hide) in 19:42 (Marshall 1978: 691).

20 Some regard ἀποκαλύπτω as conceptually equal to Matthew's παρουσία (parousia). The noun ἀποκάλυψις (revelation) does have an eschatological force; 1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thess. 1:7–8; 1 Pet. 1:7, 13; 4:13; Zmijewski 1972: 442 n. 50.

8 The more intensive ἀποκρύπτω (to conceal) is used in contrast to unveiling (ἀποκαλύπτω) revelation and the mystery of God's plan (Luke 10:21; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). Luke uses the synonymous παρακαλύπτω (to conceal) in Luke 9:45 and κρύπτω (to hide) in 19:42 (Marshall 1978: 691).

25 So ἀπέλαβες means “you have received.” BAGD 94 and BAA 189 note that ἀπολαμβάνω has a commercial sense here: the rich man is “paid up.” The sense equals that of ἀπέχω (to receive) in 6:24.

18 Ἀπολαμβάνω (to receive back) occurs elsewhere in Luke at 6:34; 15:27; 16:25; 23:41; BAGD 94; BAA 189. The idea of “receiving back” is often associated with divine retribution or reward: 2 John 8; Rom. 1:27; Col. 3:24.

8 On the rare use of ἀπολύω as a description of being freed from the effects of disease, see BAGD 96; BAA 193; Josephus, Antiquities 3.11.3 §264. The term is generally used of freeing prisoners or releasing from debt. This common usage may inform the use of the term here. Contextually, the perfect tense announces entry into a state of healing; Arndt 1956: 329.

23 Ὥρμησεν in Matt. 8:32 = Mark 5:13 = Luke 8:33 means to rush irrationally or with some emotion; Fitzmyer 1981: 739; Bertram, TDNT 5:470; BAGD 581; BAA 1178; elsewhere only at Acts 7:57; 19:29. On ἀποπνίγω (to drown), see BAGD 97; BAA 195; elsewhere only Luke 8:7 (of thorns and thistles that choke); a related verb, συμπνίγω, occurs in 8:14, 42.

4 Guenther 1985: 31. Nolland 1989: 265–68 has a full discussion, though he sees too much distance between Paul’s and Luke’s views when he argues that Luke limits the term ἀπόστολος to the Twelve. One of the ways that Luke indicates respect for Paul is by calling him an apostle in Acts 14:4, 14 and by showing that Paul does everything that Peter did as an apostle. Nolland decides that the Lucan use reflects a later title. The use of the phrase the Twelve as a fixed technical term in the earliest Christian material—even when the Twelve are not present (1 Cor. 15:5)—also speaks for the authenticity of ἀπόστολος here.

8 Note γάρ (for) and the solemn and emphatic λέγω ὑμῖν (I say to you; also 22:18; 13:35; 9:27). Ἕως ὅτου (until; also 12:50; 13:8) is equivalent to ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (from now on) in 22:18 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1396).

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

10 Marshall 1978: 493–94 notes the custom to eat two meals daily: a mid-morning meal called ἄριστον (BAGD 106; BAA 214) and a mid-afternoon meal called δεῖπνον (BAGD 173; BAA 346; m. Šab. 16.2). On the Sabbath, three meals were served, but a Sabbath meal is not indicated here. John 21:12, 15 refers to an early meal with a verb related to ἄριστον, so it is clear that this is not an evening setting. Josephus, Life 54 §279, notes a Sabbath meal at the sixth hour, or midday.

17 A similar metonymic meaning for ἄρτος as food, not just bread, is found in Luke 7:33; John 13:18; 2 Thess. 3:8, 12; Marshall 1978: 458;

Behm, TDNT 1:477–78.

4 For ἀρχή, see Luke 1:2; Acts 11:15; 26:4; for the verbal equivalent, see Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. For the participle ἀρχόμενος, present here, see Luke 24:27; Acts 8:35; 11:4; Bovon 1989: 189.

12 On the synagogue leader (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), see Schrage, TDNT 7:847. This person was responsible for the order and progress of worship, so he is the right one to speak. The most learned member presents the official view on Jesus' act. There is no need to argue for a redactional seam at the shift of address to the audience. The leader is responsible for the assembly's worship (Nolland 1993a: 724). Nolland argues that "the directive fits only imperfectly in the flow of the story." I disagree: practice and custom is the issue here. The issue cannot arise until Jesus heals.

13 Marshall 1978: 140; Luke 7:39, 49; 16:3; 18:4; Black 1967: 302. Manson 1949: 40 notes that the Semitism is reflected in Luke's wording, while Matthew has a more stylized Greek. The verb ἄρχω occurs in the middle voice, ἄρχομαι, meaning "to begin," thirty-one times in Luke and thirteen times in Matthew.

6 On the syntax of ἤρξαντο (they began), which Luke often uses to speak of a fresh reaction, see 4:21; 5:21; 7:15; 12:45; 13:25; 19:37; Plummer 1896: 520; Grundmann 1963: 422. Κατηγορέω (to accuse) is used elsewhere by Luke at Luke 6:7; 23:10, 14; Acts 22:30; 24:2, 8, 13, 19; 25:5, 11, 16; 28:19; Büchsel, TDNT 3:637.

4 For ἀρχή, see Luke 1:2; Acts 11:15; 26:4; for the verbal equivalent, see Acts 1:21–22; 10:37. For the participle ἀρχόμενος, present here, see Luke 24:27; Acts 8:35; 11:4; Bovon 1989: 189.

16 Αὐστηρός (severe, strict, exacting) is used in the NT only in this pericope (twice); also 2 Macc. 14:30. In P. Tebt. vol. 2 #315 line 19, the term is used of a demanding financial inspector; MM 93; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

4 Αὐτῷ (by him) is the only NT example of the dative of agent, which is good Attic Greek; BDF §191.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

15 To indicate sleep, Luke uses ὕπνος (BAGD 843; BAA 1679; elsewhere in Luke's writings twice in Acts 20:9) and βαρέω (to be heavy; BAGD 133; BAA 267; elsewhere in Luke's writings only in Luke 21:34). In 22:45–46, Luke uses the synonymous κοιμάω and καθεύδω. It is clear that the disciples are in deep sleep, for the phrase βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ translates literally as "weighed down with sleep." Balz, TDNT 8:554, speaks of disciples "drunk with sleep." Bovon's term "second consciousness" (1989: 498) is too visionary in force. He cites Gen. 15:12; Dan. 8:18; 10:9.

20 A similar use of βίος occurs in 8:43. The term has a slightly different force in 15:12, 30, where it means "inheritance"; Marshall 1978: 752.

57 The contrast in the verbs at the end of the passage is key. Βλέπω is used figuratively with the meaning "to perceive" in Rom. 7:23; 2 Cor. 7:8;

Col. 2:5; Heb. 2:9; 10:25; Michaelis, TDNT 5:344.

19 For βοάω (to cry out), see BAGD 144; BAA 288 §1d; Stauffer, TDNT 1:625–26; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 3:3 = Mark 1:3 = Luke 3:4 = John 1:23; Mark 15:34 (= Matt. 27:46 [ἀναβοάω]); Luke 9:38; 18:7, 38; Acts 8:7; 17:6; 25:24; Gal. 4:27. In the LXX at Gen. 4:10; Judg. 10:10 (B); Num. 20:16 (ἀναβοάω). Rev. 6:9–11 is conceptually similar.

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

7 Βουνός (hill) is rare in the NT, both times being tied to an OT text: Luke 3:5 (Isa. 40:4) and Luke 23:30 (Hos. 10:8); BAGD 146; BAA 292; BDR §126.1b.5. In contrast, the synonymous ὄρος (mountain) appears sixty-three times in the NT.

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

8 Lachs 1987: 328 argues that the alternation of βρέφος and παιδίον may have behind it a Semitic term that includes both age groups.

5 Fitzmyer 1985: 1046 suggests that γάμος is broad enough to describe any feast, not just a wedding; cf. Esth. 2:18; 9:22. It can simply be a celebration. The difference in sense is not significant, since a representative picture is present.

11 Outside of this pericope and its parallels, τῆς γενεᾶς ταύτης occurs in Luke 7:31 = Matt. 11:16; Luke 11:50–51 = Matt. 23:36; Luke 17:25; 21:32 = Mark 13:30 = Matt. 23:34; Büchsel, TDNT 1:663. Note that the concept is multiply attested in Q and Mark.

27 Gressmann 1911 notes the nature of the customs. Perles's attempt (1919–20) to suggest an Aramaic element תבל (tbl) behind the tradition that should be translated "seasoning" instead of "soil" fails on lexical grounds. The תבל/γῆ interchange is found in Isa. 14:21; 26:9, 18; 1 Chron. 16:30; cf. 11QtgJob 24.8; 29.3 with Job 34:13; 37:12. Correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1069–70 and Black 1967: 166–67.

21 So γνωρίζω often in the NT (Rom. 9:22–23; Acts 2:28), and often tied to the idea of making known a mystery (Col. 1:27; Eph. 1:9; 3:5, 10; 6:19); Bultmann, TDNT 1:718.

31 Grundmann 1963: 250 suggests that γνώσεως (knowledge) is an objective genitive, thus "the key for knowledge." Another option, a genitive of apposition ("the key that is knowledge," by which is meant "obedient knowledge") is less likely. This latter reading would be an odd way to say "you have taken away knowledge," but so Jeremias, TDNT 3:747–48, who acknowledges that this image, though different from the other option, is similar.

34 Γνωστός (acquaintance, friend; BAGD 164 §1b; BAA 328 §1b) occurs elsewhere with this sense at Luke 2:44 and John 18:15–16 and in the LXX at 2 Kings 10:11; Ps. 30:12 [31:11 Engl.]; 54:14 [55:13 Engl.]; 87:9, 19 [88:8, 18 Engl.]; cf. 38:12.

14 Similarly high interest for items is found in ancient Egyptian documents; Derrett 1972b. The term τὰ γράμματα describes the promissory note; BAGD 165 §2a; BAA 330 §2b; Schrenk, TDNT 1:764–65; Fitzmyer 1985: 1100.

49 Ἀγρυπνέω occurs elsewhere in the NT at Mark 13:33; Eph. 6:18; Heb. 13:17; BAGD 14; BAA 24. The usual NT term for this concept is γρηγορέω (to watch); BAGD 167; BAA 334; e.g., Matt. 26:41; 1 Thess. 5:6; cf. 1 Pet. 4:7; 1 Esdr. 8:58 LXX [= 8:59 NRSV]; Luke 8:13; 22:40, 46.

14 One other Synoptic difference needs notation. Luke uses what some see as the narrower term for petition: δέησις. The distinction that δέησις = petition and προσευχή = prayer is not present in the NT, and the reference in 5:33 appears to be general. For the distinction, see Greeven, TDNT 2:807, though he acknowledges that it is harder to argue for the distinction in nouns.

5 Marshall 1978: 125–26. One can only note the restraint in this account compared to the apocryphal gospels. In contrast, the Jesus Seminar puts Jesus' saying in 2:49 in black type (meaning that it does not go back to Jesus); Funk and Hoover 1993: 275–76. They see the unit as Luke's production, drawing on the child-prodigy genre, the Lucan emphasis on design, and its lack of attestation elsewhere. But these criteria ignore the potential of a unique source surfacing in Luke's research and the evidence for the unit's origins in Palestinian settings (see the discussion above and n. 3). Its enigmatic expression also reflects Jesus' style (see also Nolland 1989: 127–28, who speaks less directly on the issue of historicity in 2:49). That this is the only use of δεῖ relating Jesus to the Father speaks against a Lucan origin. On the historicity of the entire scene, see the exegesis of 2:50.

2 See Borg 1987: 162–63, 170, who notes Jer. 12:7 and Ezek. 11:22–23. So also Horsley 1987: 300–302, who calls Luke 13:32–33 part of a "fairly solid tradition" (p. 190). For the debate on 13:31–33, see Nolland 1993a: 738–39, who accepts 13:31–32, but regards 13:33 as a Lucan redaction that makes the transition from 13:32 to 13:34. However, the use of δεῖ is too widespread in the Gospel tradition to make this conclusion solid (see the exegesis of 13:33). In addition, as Marshall 1978: 570 suggests, 13:33 is an integral link to 13:32.

13 While Acts 14:22 uses δεῖ to say that the disciples' suffering is also inevitable (Fitzmyer 1985: 1170), it does not speak of Jesus' suffering. For the view that the disciples' suffering in Luke–Acts mirrors Jesus', see Moessner 1990.

2 The idea of fulfilling Scripture occurs throughout Luke's writings, frequently with τελέω (BAGD 811 §1, esp. §2; BAA 1617 §2; Luke 2:39; 12:50; 18:31; 22:37; Acts 13:29) or δεῖ (Luke 9:22; 17:25); also Luke 13:22, 32; 24:44–49; Acts 2:23. Delling, TDNT 8:60 n. 16, says that this emphasis is part of special Lucan material.

20 On δεῖπνον, a full, formal meal in the evening, see Luke 14:12; John 13:4, 21; BAGD 173; BAA 346 (cf. δειπνέω, to dine, in Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; Rev. 3:20). For Jesus' reversal of the image, see Luke 12:37 and John 13:4.

10 Marshall 1978: 493–94 notes the custom to eat two meals daily: a mid-morning meal called ἄριστον (BAGD 106; BAA 214) and a mid-afternoon meal called δεῖπνον (BAGD 173; BAA 346; m. Šab. 16.2). On the Sabbath, three meals were served, but a Sabbath meal is not indicated here. John 21:12, 15 refers to an early meal with a verb related to ἄριστον, so it is clear that this is not an evening setting. Josephus, Life 54 §279, notes a Sabbath meal at the sixth hour, or midday.

20 On δεῖπνον, a full, formal meal in the evening, see Luke 14:12; John 13:4, 21; BAGD 173; BAA 346 (cf. δειπνέω, to dine, in Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; Rev. 3:20). For Jesus' reversal of the image, see Luke 12:37 and John 13:4.

50 Luke often emphasizes prayer for the disciple: δέομαι in Luke 5:12; 8:38; 9:38, 40; 22:32; Acts 4:31; 8:22, 24; and προσεύχομαι in Luke 1:10; 3:21; 5:16; 6:12; 11:1 [twice]; 18:1; Acts 1:24; 8:15; Zmijewski 1972: 289. Constant prayer is called for at Luke 18:1, 7–8; Rom. 12:12; and 1 Thess. 5:17.

13 In Sir. 23:1, 4; 51:10 πατήρ often occurs alongside κύριος (Lord) or δεσπότης (master) (Schrenk, TDNT 5:979 n. 209, 981, 984–85). Elsewhere in Judaism at Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] nos. 4–6 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–57, 460); Wis. 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:3, 8. In the OT at Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; 64:8 [64:7 MT]; Jer. 3:4; Ps. 68:5 [68:6 MT]; 89:26 [89:27

MT] (of God's relationship to the king, as also 2 Sam. 7:14); Mal. 1:6; 2:10; 1 Chron. 29:10. As a NT term of intimacy, see Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6; Mark 14:36.

10 So δέχομαι (BAGD 177 §1, §3b; BAA 355 §3b) indicates receiving the word of God by Moses (Acts 7:38), the gospel (2 Cor. 11:4), financial gifts (Phil. 4:18), a guest in the home (Matt. 10:14 = Luke 9:5; 16:4), teaching (Luke 8:13; Acts 8:14; 11:1), the kingdom (Mark 10:15), and grace (2 Cor. 6:1). One can speak of receiving Jesus by appealing to John 1:12; the other biblical metaphor is to receive the kingdom. To accept the king is to enter the kingdom and its promises.

26 Fitzmyer 1981: 470; LSJ 387; BAA 358. Some of these figures in Palestine would be Jews. A related term, δημόσιος, occurs four times in Acts (5:18; 16:37; 18:28; 20:20).

11 Carson 1984: 112. In Bovon's short excursus (1989: 196–97) on the term devil, he notes that Luke uses διάβολος and σατανᾶς seven times each in Luke–Acts. The reference to διάβολος in Luke 4:2 is possibly Luke's choice, though Matt. 4:1, 8 renders this judgment as less than certain. Matt. 4:3 uses ὁ πειράζων and Matt. 4:10 σατανᾶ, which Luke lacks. In 4:1–13, Luke speaks only of the διάβολος, avoiding Matthew's variation of terms and Mark's reference to Satan.

7 Διαγογγύζω (to grumble) appears in the NT only here and in 19:7. This idea is a significant one in the OT and is often negative in force: Num. 11:1; 14:27, 29 (using the simple γογγύζω); Danker 1988: 274. The word order, with Pharisees first, is unusual; so 5:30, but not 5:21; 6:7; 11:53.

19 The verb διακονέω (to serve) has religious significance later in the NT: Matt. 20:28 (twice) = Mark 10:45 (twice); 2 Cor. 8:19; 1 Pet. 4:10; esp. 1 Tim. 3:10, 13 (of the diaconate office). Here we have an everyday meaning: “to wait on tables”; Luke 12:37; 22:26–27 (three times); Acts 6:2; BAGD 184; BAA 368.

35 On διαλογισμός, see BAGD 186 §1; BAA 372 §1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:97 §B1. The term is often negative in the NT (Rom. 1:21; 1 Cor. 3:20; Mark 7:21; Matt. 15:19; Luke 2:35; 6:8; 9:47), with Rom. 14:1, where it means “reasoning,” being the only neutral use of the term. Matt. 9:4 has a synonymous term: ἐνθύμησις.

8 Καρδία (BAGD 403 §1bβ; BAA 819 §1bβ) occurs with διαλογισμός (thoughts) in 2:35 and 9:47 (cf. 3:15 and 5:22) and with the verb ἀναβαίνω (to arise), which may be rendered idiomatically as “thoughts arise within the person,” in Acts 7:23; 1 Cor. 2:9; Jer. 3:16–17. BDR §4.3.8 calls the expression of thoughts arising in the heart a Semitism. Διαλογισμός (BAGD 186 §2; BAA 372 §2) carries the sense of “doubt” or “dispute” in Luke 9:46; 24:38; Phil. 2:14; 1 Tim. 2:8 and the sense of “thoughts” in Matt. 15:19 = Mark 7:21; Luke 2:35; 5:22; 6:8; 9:47; Rom. 1:21; 14:1; 1 Cor. 3:20; James 2:4.

13 Διατίθημι has the meaning “to assign” in Josephus, Antiquities 13.16.1 §407; BAGD 189–90 §3; BAA 381 §2; Behm, TDNT 2:104–6.

10 For more on διήγησις as meaning oral and written accounts, see the introduction to §I.A above and TDNT 2:909, where Büchsel provides a nice summary of usage. One parallel to note is Polybius 5.31.4.

20 On δόξα, see BAGD 204 §2; BAA 410 §2; Schweizer 1984: 83; and Hendriksen 1978: 235–36 (who cites 2 Chron. 9:9–28; Eccles. 2:1–11; Rev. 18:12–13). Kittel, TDNT 2:237, suggests translating the term "radiance." The term alludes to the splendor and value of these kingdoms.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

19 Δυσμή (only here and 13:29 in Luke) refers to the sun's setting, thus to the west; BAGD 209; BAA 422. These western rains were crucial for the well-being of Palestinian farmers.

22 For δῶμα, see BAGD 210; BAA 423; Luke 5:19; 12:3; Josh. 2:6, 8; 2 Sam. 16:22; Isa. 22:1. The flat roof was probably used as living space (Acts 10:9; Nolland 1993a: 861).

3 The case for this approach is enhanced syntactically if ἐγγίζω can mean "to be in the vicinity of" rather than "to draw near," as Porter 1992 argues.

5 Ἐγγίζω (to come near) is often used to denote approach, especially in conjunction with the preposition εἰς (to); Luke 19:29 = Matt. 21:1 = Mark 11:1; Luke 24:28; Tob. 11:1; Plummer 1896: 430. See the introduction to this unit for the possibility that this remark is a condensation of Mark 10:46 and for the linkage of Luke 18:35–43 and 19:1–10.

15 That Luke is the only Synoptist to note this praise leads Marshall 1978: 714 to raise the possibility that Luke uses another source because of the unusual combinations of ἐγγίζω with πρός (to draw near to) and πρός with the dative. The latter construction occurs only here in Luke, six times elsewhere in the NT (Mark 5:11; John 18:16; 20:11, 12 [twice]; Rev. 1:13; BDR §240.2), and 104 times in the LXX.

4 Κ αὶ ἐγένετο (or ἐγένετο δέ) with a verb is a common Lucan expression: 1:5, 8, 23, 41, 59; 2:1, 6; 6:1; 8:22; Fitzmyer 1981: 363; Klostermann 1929: 16–17. On the grammar with ἀκούω, where the genitive indicates the speaker and the accusative the thing heard, see BDF §173 and BDR §173.1–2. Luke 11:31 and 15:25 are grammatically parallel to 1:41.

17 On the term ἐκβάλλω (to thrust out), see BAGD 237 §2 and BAA 478 §2. Against Hendriksen 1978: 572, the term does not mean "force out" here. It is, however, a strong, graphic term that shows that God calls and equips; so Arndt 1956: 281.

18 The passages match except for the reversal of two words, ἐργάτας ἐκβάλῃ (thrust out workers), in Matthew. Gospel of Thomas 73 also has an exact parallel; in Judaism, see m. ›Abot 2.15.

15 Ἐκβάλλω is a term for judgment in Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 25:30; John 12:31; Bertram, TDNT 4:839 n. 56.

17 Delling 1962: 16 n. 68 cites numerous LXX uses of ἐκδικέω: Ps. 149:7 (of the punishment of the wicked); 1 Macc. 3:15; 7:9, 24, 38; Exod. 12:12 and Num. 33:4 (of what God did to the Egyptians in the plagues); Mic. 5:14 [5:15 Engl.] (of judgment on the nations); Ezek. 16:41 and 23:10 (of what the nations did to Israel).

20 Marshall 1978: 821 argues that ἐκλείπω (elsewhere in the NT at Luke 16:9; 23:45; Heb. 1:12) here means "to disappear," so the idea is that

Peter's faith does not disappear. He avoids ultimate failure (cf. Col. 1:21–23). Nolland's paraphrase (1993b: 1072) of faith "drained away to nothing" gives the sense.

20 Bock 1987: 115. Ὁ ἐκλεκτός is the normal OT form: Isa. 42:1 LXX uses it as a description of Israel. In Luke 23:35, the people use ὁ ἐκλεκτός to scoff at Jesus' messianic claim; thus, the regal force for Luke is indisputable.

8 This is the only NT use of ἐξουθενέω with the meaning "to treat with contempt" (BAGD 277 §3; BAA 562 §3). The citation of Ps. 118:22 in Acts 4:11 also shows Jesus as the righteous, rejected sufferer. The other verb, ἐμπαίζω (to mock, make fun of; BAGD 255; BAA 516), is used in the passion prediction of Luke 18:32 (= Matt. 20:19 = Mark 10:34) and often in the passion narrative: Matt. 27:29, 31= Mark 15:20; Matt. 27:41 = Mark 15:31; Luke 22:63; 23:36.

49 Ellis 1974: 158 notes that ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ (in this hour) refers not so much to chronology as to "this key eschatological time"; cf. Luke 12:56; 19:44; 21:24; 22:53; 23:43; John 4:23; 5:25; 2 Cor. 6:2; Heb. 3:7–4:10.

33 Ἐνέχω is a difficult term to translate (BAGD 265; BAA 536; Mark 6:19): "to press against someone," "to hold a grudge," or "to have it in for someone." With δεινῶς (terribly), the idea is "to be very hostile" to someone (BAGD 173; BAA 346; Matt. 8:6). Hanse, TDNT 2:828, argues for "to press against him," where the idea is that of being surrounded by hostile opponents.

1 Jeremias 1980: 266 argues that ἐντὸς ὑμῶν (in your midst) in 17:21 is not Lucan. Whether Luke worded the introduction is an open question.

After a detailed presentation of the options, Zmijewski 1972: 387–90 decides for a special Lucan source.

8 Josephus, Antiquities 10.5.2 §83 (of Jehoiakim); Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 10.10.7; Livy 22.3.4. Ἐντρέπω is used in Luke 20:13 = Matt. 21:37 = Mark 12:6 to describe the respect that the master's son should get; elsewhere in the NT at 1 Cor. 4:14; 2 Thess. 3:14; Titus 2:8; Heb. 12:9; BAGD 269 §2b; BAA 544 §2b. On not fearing God, see Deut. 25:18 (of the Amalekites).

9 Michaelis, TDNT 4:247–48, describes the image as one of heavenly glory; so ἐξαστράπτων (gleaming like lightning); Ezek. 1:4, 7. Conceptual parallels occur in Ezek. 1:27–28; Dan. 10:6; Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10; Rev. 2:17; 6:2; 20:11; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:97; 1 Enoch 38.4; 104.2; 2 Bar. 51.

8 This is the only NT use of ἐξουθενέω with the meaning "to treat with contempt" (BAGD 277 §3; BAA 562 §3). The citation of Ps. 118:22 in Acts 4:11 also shows Jesus as the righteous, rejected sufferer. The other verb, ἐμπαίζω (to mock, make fun of; BAGD 255; BAA 516), is used in the passion prediction of Luke 18:32 (= Matt. 20:19 = Mark 10:34) and often in the passion narrative: Matt. 27:29, 31= Mark 15:20; Matt. 27:41 = Mark 15:31; Luke 22:63; 23:36.

42 Schwarz 1974 sees these commendatory remarks as ironic; they are really condemnatory. This interpretation is forced and is not a possible rendering of ἐπαινέω (to praise); BAGD 281; BAA 569 (elsewhere in the NT at Rom. 15:11; 1 Cor. 11:2, 17, 22 [twice]). Also failing is Bailey's attempt (1976: 107) to argue that ἐπαινέω has eschatological force in picturing approval at the judgment. Other than the use of praise in Matt.

25:21, 34, the Gospels do not have this eschatological force, and in this Matthean context the eschatological force is clear, not inferred as it would have to be here. Porter 1990: 146–47 recognizes that the term must be positive, for the steward is commended for choosing to associate with the sons of this age, a comment dripping with bitter irony from the master. If one is to argue the irony position, this is the best way to do it. Against it, however, is the comparison in 16:8–9, which makes the steward look like a positive example through the commendation, not a negative one.

6 The word for begging, ἐπαιτέω, is rare in the NT: elsewhere only Luke 16:3 and Mark 10:46 variant; also Ps. 109:10 [108:10 LXX]; Sir. 40:28; BAGD 282; BAA 571. Mark 10:46 uses προσαίτης (beggar), which appears elsewhere only in John 9:8; BAGD 711; BAA 1425.

23 The phrase ἐπιβαλοῦσιν ἐφ’ ὑμᾶς τὰς χεῖρας (laying hands on you) occurs in 1 Kings 20:6 [21:6 LXX]; Luke 20:19; 22:53; Acts 4:3; 5:18; 12:1; 21:27; Mark 14:46; John 7:30, 44. On διώκω (lit., to pursue) as persecution, see Luke 11:49 and Acts 7:52.

1 Ἐπιγινώσκω is frequently used by Luke with the sense “to thoroughly ascertain”; Luke 7:37; Acts 19:34; 22:29; 24:11; 28:1; Plummer 1896: 521. Here it almost has the force of “to discover.”

11 Ἐπικρίνω can have the technical meaning “to issue a sentence” (2 Macc. 4:47; 3Macc. 4:2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1492; Plummer 1896: 527), although it was also used of determining whether a person was fit for military service or exempt from a poll tax (MM 240).

12 Ἐπιρίπτω appears in the NT only here and at 1 Pet. 5:7; BAGD 298; BAA 603. In the LXX it is used of Elijah throwing his cloak over Elisha (1 Kings 19:19) and of Joab's henchman covering Amasa's corpse with a garment (2 Sam. 20:12). The declaration of Jehu as king (2 Kings 9:13) provides verbal contact only with ἱμάτιον (garment).

5 Ἐπιτιμάω here means to verbally censure; BAGD 303; BAA 614; also Luke 4:39; 8:24; 9:21, 42, 55; 17:3; 19:39; 23:40. Given Jesus' response, the effort to rebuke fails and the verb could be conative in force: "They tried to rebuke." Luke has an imperfect where Mark and Matthew have aorists.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

11 Grundmann, TDNT 2:706, says that the Bible uses ἕτοιμος to speak of three kinds of readiness: (1) ready to do good works (Titus 3:1); (2) ready to preach the gospel (1 Pet. 3:15); and (3) ready for the Lord's return (here and Matt. 24:44).

32 The KJV reflects a three-part division by reading nominative εὐδοκία; so Godet 1875: 1.132–33. Many recent translations reflect a two-part division by reading genitive εὐδοκίας; so Plummer 1896: 57–58; Fitzmyer 1981: 410–12; and R. Brown 1977: 403–5.

24 Cf. εὑρίσκω (to find) in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25 and σῴζω (to save) in Luke 9:24 = Mark 8:35. Geiger 1972: 121 speaks of the influence of Ezek. 13:18–19 (which uses περιποιέω), and Zmijewski 1976: 479 n. 56 sees a connection to Exod. 1:17 (which uses ζῳογονέω). Neither LXX reference satisfies, however, since each has only one element of Luke 17:33, and one can hardly argue for a double LXX allusion. In addition, if the LXX alteration is based on an earlier, existing traditional saying, what does it add? Περιποιέω appears only three times in the NT (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13) and the noun περιποίησις is never used in the Gospels (five times elsewhere). Since the conscious shift of terminology appears to have no point, the rare terminology is probably from a source.

25 So the passive εὐφραίνω (to rejoice); BAGD 327 §2; BAA 663 §2; Luke 12:19; 16:19; Acts 2:26; 7:41; Rom. 15:10; Gal. 4:27. Used in other passages for eschatological joy, here its meaning is more mundane. The participle φαγόντες (eating) functions like a second verb (BDF §420.3; Marshall 1978: 611): “Let us eat and rejoice.”

10 Εὐφραίνω in the passive means “to make merry, to cheer oneself”; BAGD 327; BAA 663 §2; elsewhere in Luke’s Gospel at 12:19; 15:23, 24, 29, 32. MM 267 notes a papyri that describes such a feast.

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

8 Note γάρ (for) and the solemn and emphatic λέγω ὑμῖν (I say to you; also 22:18; 13:35; 9:27). Ἕως ὅτου (until; also 12:50; 13:8) is equivalent to ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (from now on) in 22:18 (Fitzmyer 1985: 1396).

23 On περιποιέω (to gain), see BAGD 650; BAA 1310; Gen. 12:12; Exod. 1:16; elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13. On ζῳογονέω (to preserve alive), see BAGD 341; BAA 690; Exod. 1:17; Judg. 8:19; 1 Sam. 2:6; elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 7:19; 1 Tim. 6:13; Bultmann, TDNT 2:873–74.

5 The first obstacle (the crowd) is indicated by ἀπό (BAGD 87 §V.1; BAA 175 §V.1; also Luke 21:26; 22:45; 24:41; Acts 11:19; 12:14; 22:11; John 21:6; Heb. 5:7) and the second obstacle (Zacchaeus's size) by ὅτι. While ἡλικία (BAGD 345 §2; BAA 700 §2) can refer to age, here it refers to Zacchaeus's height (as in Luke 2:52; see the exegesis of 12:25). The crowd produced a barrier of a different kind in 18:39.

6 Στάσις means "rebellion or uprising" elsewhere at Mark 15:7; Luke 23:25; Acts 19:40 (elsewhere in the NT at Acts 15:2; 23:7, 10; 24:5; Heb. 9:8; BAGD 764 §2; BAA 1526 §2). This is the only NT expression of periphrasis with ἦν (was) and an aorist participle; BDR §355.1; BDF §355.1; Plummer 1896: 526 (although א* in John 18:30 also has this construction).

13 Other Gospel writers call it simply a sea (θάλασσα; Matt. 4:18; 15:29; Mark 1:16; 7:31; so also the LXX: Num. 34:11; Josh 12:3; BAGD 350; BAA 711 §2). Luke's language is precise, while the other evangelists' language reflects popular usage. Luke uses θάλασσα only three times: Luke 17:2, 6; 21:25.

8 On the term θεοῦ (of God) as tightly binding Jesus and God, see Stauffer, TDNT 3:104 n. 261; Mark 1:24; John 1:29; 6:33, 69; Luke 23:35; 2 Cor. 4:4. Grundmann, TDNT 9:532, calls it a genitive of authorship: Jesus is the Christ sent from God. The expression τὸν χριστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ is unique to Luke.

16 Θεραπεία refers to a body of servants only here in the NT; cf. Esth. 5:2b [= 15:16 NRSV]; BAGD 359 §2; BAA 729 §2; Creed 1930: 177.

7 The verb θορυβέω (to be troubled), is related to the verb used here (θορυβάζω, a hapax legomenon). Both verbs look at a situation of disorder, not in terms of illness but stress; BAGD 362–63; BAA 737; Acts 17:5; 20:10; Matt. 9:23 = Mark 5:39; 13:7 (variant reading in Codex D).

7 The verb θορυβέω (to be troubled), is related to the verb used here (θορυβάζω, a hapax legomenon). Both verbs look at a situation of disorder, not in terms of illness but stress; BAGD 362–63; BAA 737; Acts 17:5; 20:10; Matt. 9:23 = Mark 5:39; 13:7 (variant reading in Codex D).

10 Luke uses Ἰουδαία for either the smaller specific region (Luke 2:4; Acts 1:8; 8:1) or the broad area (Luke 1:5; 7:17; Acts 2:9; 10:37; 11:1, 29); Plummer 1896: 521.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

4 So the aorist passive participle σταθείς (as he stood); BAGD 382 §II.1b; BAA 775 §II.1b. The circumstantial aorist passive participle of ἵστημι is found in the NT only in Luke's writings: Luke 18:40; 19:8; Acts 2:14; 5:20; 11:13; 17:22; 25:18; 27:21; Fitzmyer 1985: 1186. In the Jewish world, it was not unusual to stand and pray (1 Sam. 1:26; 1 Kings 8:14, 22; Plummer 1896: 416; SB 1:401–2; 2:240; Marshall 1978: 679).

6 Καθαρίζω (to cleanse) is often used of leprosy: Matt. 8:2 = Mark 1:40 = Luke 5:12; Matt. 10:8; Luke 4:27; 7:22 = Matt. 11:2; Luke 17:17; Lev. 14:7; 2 Kings 5:13; BAGD 387; BAA 785.

6 Κ αθεξῆς is clearly temporal, denoting events that follow those of Luke 7; BAGD 388; BAA 788. It means afterward, but not necessarily soon afterward, as A. B. Bruce 1897: 518 correctly notes. It appears only in Luke–Acts (Luke 1:3; here; Acts 3:24; 11:4; 18:23). Acts 3:24 speaks of the sequence of prophets following Samuel—which spanned centuries.

15 To indicate sleep, Luke uses ὕπνος (BAGD 843; BAA 1679; elsewhere in Luke's writings twice in Acts 20:9) and βαρέω (to be heavy; BAGD 133; BAA 267; elsewhere in Luke's writings only in Luke 21:34). In 22:45–46, Luke uses the synonymous κοιμάω and καθεύδω. It is clear that the disciples are in deep sleep, for the phrase βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ translates literally as "weighed down with sleep." Balz, TDNT 8:554, speaks of disciples "drunk with sleep." Bovon's term "second consciousness" (1989: 498) is too visionary in force. He cites Gen. 15:12; Dan. 8:18; 10:9.

14 Grundmann, TDNT 7:650 n. 31, lists the Lucan expressions for the six phases of Jesus' career: ἔξοδος (exodus) in Luke 9:31; δόξα (glory) in Luke 24:26; ἀναλαμβάνω (taken up) in Acts 1:2, 11, 22; καθῆσθαι ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ (seated at the right hand of God) in Luke 20:42; 22:69; and Acts 2:34; ἵστημι (standing) in Acts 7:55–56; and ἔρχομαι (coming) in Luke 9:26 and Acts 1:11.

4 Κ αὶ ἐγένετο (or ἐγένετο δέ) with a verb is a common Lucan expression: 1:5, 8, 23, 41, 59; 2:1, 6; 6:1; 8:22; Fitzmyer 1981: 363;

Klostermann 1929: 16–17. On the grammar with ἀκούω, where the genitive indicates the speaker and the accusative the thing heard, see BDF §173 and BDR §173.1–2. Luke 11:31 and 15:25 are grammatically parallel to 1:41.

20 Luke alone refers explicitly to the cloth as καινός, which here means "unused." He uses the term three times in the verse, so it has a touch of emphasis. I translated it "new" to keep the parallelism and linkage clear. It usually refers to a qualitative newness; Bovon 1989: 263. So here it means a new and better teaching. Luke returns to the use of νέος in 5:37–38 in agreement with the Synoptic parallels; Behm, TDNT 3:448; Matt. 9:17; Luke 22:20. On this metaphor, see Maurer, TDNT 7:961 §4a.

24 The term καρδία describes the place of reflection; Luke 1:51; 9:47; 24:38; Acts 8:22; Mark 11:23; Behm, TDNT 3:612.

7 So καταλιθάζω (to stone to death), a NT hapax legomenon; BAGD 413–14; BAA 841; cf. Exod. 17:4; Num. 14:10. Luke mentions stoning elsewhere in Luke 13:34; Acts 5:26; 7:58; 14:19.

2 Κατάλυμα is a private house, but in Luke 2:7 it refers to the inn where Jesus was born; elsewhere in the NT only at the parallel Mark 14:14; also 1 Sam. 1:18 [no MT equivalent]; 9:22; Sir. 14:25; BAGD 414; BAA 841; Büchsel, TDNT 4:338; Stählin, TDNT 5:19 n. 136.

19 Does κατένευσαν refer to signaling with their heads or voices because their hands are busy, as Nolland 1989: 222 suggests? Cf. the use of signals in 1:62. Μέτοχος appears only here in the Gospels; Hanse, TDNT 2:831.

58 For κατανοέω, see Luke 12:24, 27; 20:23; Acts 11:6; Plummer 1896: 191. Nolland 1989: 307 argues that the force is that one should attend to nonjudgment and love of the enemy, not ethical minutiae. This is correct

contextually, but the remark is so proverbial that the application is broader. Sin in general is in view.

13 Κελεύω (to order) is frequent in Acts (e.g., 4:15; 8:38; 12:19; 21:34; 22:24, 30; 23:3, 10, 35; 25:6, 17, 21, 23; 27:43), though this is its only use in Luke. Matthew uses it seven times; BAGD 427; BAA 869.

28 Both BAGD 429 and BAA 872 define κέραμος in Luke 5:19 as "roof tile" (see their bibliographies for details); LSJ 940. Nonetheless, the meaning "clay" is possible, as in 2 Sam. 17:28 and Shepherd of Hermas, Vision 4.1.6 §22.

15 To indicate sleep, Luke uses ὕπνος (BAGD 843; BAA 1679; elsewhere in Luke's writings twice in Acts 20:9) and βαρέω (to be heavy; BAGD 133; BAA 267; elsewhere in Luke's writings only in Luke 21:34). In 22:45–46, Luke uses the synonymous κοιμάω and καθεύδω. It is clear that the disciples are in deep sleep, for the phrase βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ translates literally as "weighed down with sleep." Balz, TDNT 8:554, speaks of disciples "drunk with sleep." Bovon's term "second consciousness" (1989: 498) is too visionary in force. He cites Gen. 15:12; Dan. 8:18; 10:9.

48 The NT hapax legomenon κραιπάλη refers to the dizziness or carousing associated with drunkenness; BAGD 448; BAA 910; Ps. 78:65 [77:65 LXX]; Isa. 24:20; 29:9. Μέθη (drunkenness) and μέριμνα (worries) are often mentioned in the NT as obstacles to spirituality: μέθη in Rom. 13:13 and Gal. 5:21, and μέριμνα in Matt. 13:22 = Mark 4:19 = Luke 8:14 (cf. Luke 12:22). On being morally sober, see 1 Thess. 5:7; on being spiritually directed, see Eph. 5:18.

8 The more intensive ἀποκρύπτω (to conceal) is used in contrast to unveiling (ἀποκαλύπτω) revelation and the mystery of God's plan (Luke 10:21; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). Luke uses the synonymous παρακαλύπτω (to conceal) in Luke 9:45 and κρύπτω (to hide) in 19:42 (Marshall 1978: 691).

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός (stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

15 Egelkraut 1976: 143, esp. n. 1; Miyoshi 1974: 59–61. For example, μετὰ ταῦτα occurs nine times in Luke–Acts, but not at all in Matthew and Mark (unless one counts the textually uncertain Mark 16:12). The use of ὁ κύριος (the Lord) in narrative introductions is Lucan; see the exegesis of Luke 2:11. The verb ἀναδείκνυμι (to appoint) appears only here and in Acts 1:24; Schlier, TDNT 2:30.

13 In Sir. 23:1, 4; 51:10 πατήρ often occurs alongside κύριος (Lord) or δεσπότης (master) (Schrenk, TDNT 5:979 n. 209, 981, 984–85). Elsewhere in Judaism at Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] nos. 4–6 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–57, 460); Wis. 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:3, 8. In the OT at Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; 64:8 [64:7 MT]; Jer. 3:4; Ps. 68:5 [68:6 MT]; 89:26 [89:27 MT] (of God's relationship to the king, as also 2 Sam. 7:14); Mal. 1:6; 2:10;

1 Chron. 29:10. As a NT term of intimacy, see Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6; Mark 14:36.

20 Luke uses κύριος as a title for Jesus fifteen times in the narrative comments of his Gospel, almost always in non-Marcan settings (7:13, 19; 10:1, 39, 41; 11:39; 12:42a; 13:15; 17:5, 6; 18:6; 19:8a; 22:61 [twice]; 24:3); Osborne 1984: 104, esp. n. 5.

7 This pericope contains no allusion to infant baptism (Marshall 1978: 682; Schweizer 1984: 285; Tiede 1988: 309–10; and Fitzmyer 1985: 1193 correctly challenge Jeremias 1960: 54; Cullmann 1950: 76–78; and Grundmann 1963: 353), though by implication a child's spiritual responses should be encouraged and accepted. Jeremias notes the use of κωλύω in baptismal settings (Matt. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17), but in Luke 18, the point is blessing, not baptism (against the Jesus Seminar [Funk and Hoover 1993: 370], who import a baptismal sense here; see the discussion of sources and historicity above).

10 For ὄχλος in Luke, see 4:42; 5:1, 3, 15, 19, 29; 6:17, 19; 7:9, 11, 12, 24; 8:4, 19, 40, 42, 45; 9:11, 12, 16, 18, 37, 38; 11:14, 27, 29; 12:1, 13, 54; 14:25; 18:36; 19:3, 39; 22:6, 47; 23:4, 48. In 8:40–56, ὄχλος is synonymous to λαός (people), as 8:47 shows. Ὄχλος recalls the interested group of 8:4, 19. Pointing to 8:47, Bovon 1989: 446 sees a more expectant crowd and speaks of their eschatological hope as they await Jesus, but the term is more neutral here. Schürmann 1969: 489 rightly speaks of their expectation of miracles, as Mark 6:53–56 indicates. See the exegesis of Luke 8:4.

32 Λέγω ὑμῖν (I say to you) elsewhere introduces applications in Luke: 14:24; 15:7, 10; 16:9; 18:8, 14; 19:26; Fitzmyer 1985: 912.

11 Both verbs appear only here and in the parallel at Matt. 21:44. On συνθλάω, see BAGD 790; BAA 1575; Ps. 57:7 LXX [58:6 Engl.]; Mic. 3:3. On λικμάω, see BAGD 474–75; BAA 963; Dan. 2:44 [Theodotion]; Ruth 3:2; Job 27:21; Isa. 17:13; Jer. 38:10 LXX [31:10 Engl.]; Amos 9:9; Josephus, Antiquities 5.9.3 §328.

29 Holtz 1968: 42 argues that λογίζομαι (to reckon) is a sign of LXX influence, claiming that it is not the normal rendering of Hebrew מָנָה (mānâ, to count, measure). The LXX rendering of מנה Niphal is, however, fairly evenly split: twice each by λογίζομαι and ἀριθμέω (to count) and once each by ἐξαριθμέω (to count) and ἀναρίθμητος (innumerable). The presence of λογίζομαι in Luke thus does not indicate his use of the LXX.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

29 Either ἀδίκῳ μαμωνᾷ means “worldly wealth” or it is an exhortation to be a good steward of money gained dishonestly—an impossible sense. There is a pattern in these applications: stewardship (16:8b), money (16:9), stewardship (16:10), money (16:11), and stewardship and money (16:12–13).

25 Schürmann 1969: 117–18 notes the unique Lucan usage in 2:19 involving the specific form of Mary’s name; fourteen of the twenty-seven uses of Μαριάμ are in Luke–Acts (but eleven of these are in the infancy material, so the usage may reflect sources). In addition, all six NT uses of συμβάλλω are in Luke–Acts. Also tied up in this point is a textual issue (see the additional notes on 2:19). I read Μαρία here, a reading that makes the possibility of Lucan composition less likely.

24 In Acts 4:24–31 believers rejoice that they are found worthy of suffering as they boldly declare Jesus' name. The church leaders are witnesses (μάρτυς) in the midst of rejection: Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39, 41; 13:31; 22:15; 26:16 (Isa. 43–44 alludes to this concept in the OT).

8 BAGD 496; BAA 1006; Grundmann, TDNT 4:541–42. Μεγαλειότης is used in Acts 19:27 of Artemis; in 2 Pet. 1:16 of Christ; in Dan. 7:27 of the nations; and in 1 Esdr. 1:4 [1:5 NRSV] of Solomon. A related term is found in Luke 1:49.

48 The NT hapax legomenon κραιπάλη refers to the dizziness or carousing associated with drunkenness; BAGD 448; BAA 910; Ps. 78:65 [77:65 LXX]; Isa. 24:20; 29:9. Μέθη (drunkenness) and μέριμνα (worries) are often mentioned in the NT as obstacles to spirituality: μέθη in Rom. 13:13 and Gal. 5:21, and μέριμνα in Matt. 13:22 = Mark 4:19 = Luke 8:14 (cf. Luke 12:22). On being morally sober, see 1 Thess. 5:7; on being spiritually directed, see Eph. 5:18.

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression “Palestinian.”

3 Μείζων is superlative, not comparative, since there are more than two disciples (cf. the use of μικρότερος, the least, in 9:48; BDF §244). Luke’s characteristic optative εἴη (might be) expresses a question whose answer is uncertain; BDR §267.2.3, §385.2.2; Luke 1:62; 3:15; 6:11.

5 Μείζων (greatest) is comparative in form but probably superlative in context; BDF §244. But note that in 22:26–27 the same term is comparative again.

3 Bayer 1986: 193–94. Appealing to possible oral tradition, Marshall 1978: 394 more cautiously notes that μέλλει reflects an Aramaic participle and thus perhaps the saying’s ancient form. Colpe, TDNT 8:444, speaks of a possible “unabbreviated special tradition,” though he also sees the church developing this tradition. Fitzmyer 1981: 812 sees Luke’s dependence only on Mark, though he has trouble explaining Luke’s abbreviated prediction. Bayer 1986: 197 makes a good case against the Lucan short form as the original form, arguing that Luke has abbreviated the tradition. Against a second source is Nolland 1993a: 512.

44 The verbal form is found in 10:41; 12:11, 22, 25, 26. Μέριμνα is excessive self-concern over one’s welfare; Bovon 1989: 410 speaks of “egocentric worry.”

48 The NT hapax legomenon κραιπάλη refers to the dizziness or carousing associated with drunkenness; BAGD 448; BAA 910; Ps. 78:65 [77:65 LXX]; Isa. 24:20; 29:9. Μέθη (drunkenness) and μέριμνα (worries) are often mentioned in the NT as obstacles to spirituality: μέθη in Rom.

13:13 and Gal. 5:21, and μέριμνα in Matt. 13:22 = Mark 4:19 = Luke 8:14 (cf. Luke 12:22). On being morally sober, see 1 Thess. 5:7; on being spiritually directed, see Eph. 5:18.

8 All other uses of μὴ γένοιτο are made by Paul, who uses it fourteen times, ten times in Romans alone (e.g., 3:4, 6, 31; 6:2, 15; BDF §384; BDR §384.2). Fitzmyer 1985: 1285 notes that the Hebrew equivalent translates, "It is an abomination to me/us" (Gen. 44:17; Josh. 22:29).

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression "Palestinian."

20 It is likely that μικρότερος is to be taken as a superlative. BDF (§60, §244) discusses the construction, but does not mention this verse. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 erroneously attributes this form of the remark to the early church; see the introduction to 7:18–35. The blessedness of the μικρότερος is frequent in the NT: Matt. 10:42; 18:10, 14; Mark 9:42; Luke 9:48; Nolland 1989: 337.

3 Μείζων is superlative, not comparative, since there are more than two disciples (cf. the use of μικρότερος, the least, in 9:48; BDF §244). Luke's characteristic optative εἴη (might be) expresses a question whose answer is uncertain; BDR §267.2.3, §385.2.2; Luke 1:62; 3:15; 6:11.

24 The verb μωρανθῇ literally means for salt "to become foolish," a personification that shows its total lack of value because it is no longer salty; BAGD 531 §2; BAA 1075 §2. There may be a wordplay on the Semitic תפל (tpl), which can mean "to be foolish" or "to be unsavory"; Job 1:22; Jer. 23:13; Marshall 1978: 595; Black 1967: 166; Schwarz 1978. Nolland 1993a: 765 notes that the figure is based on the result of salt losing its saltiness, regardless of whether it actually happens.

20 Luke alone refers explicitly to the cloth as καινός, which here means "unused." He uses the term three times in the verse, so it has a touch of emphasis. I translated it "new" to keep the parallelism and linkage clear. It usually refers to a qualitative newness; Bovon 1989: 263. So here it means a new and better teaching. Luke returns to the use of νέος in 5:37–38 in agreement with the Synoptic parallels; Behm, TDNT 3:448; Matt. 9:17; Luke 22:20. On this metaphor, see Maurer, TDNT 7:961 §4a.

17 Νύμφη (lit., bride; BAGD 545 §2; BAA 1103 §2) in this context means "bride" to the mother-in-law (πενθερά; BAGD 642; BAA 1295), thus, daughter-in-law (Marshall 1978: 549; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1099).

4 Fitzmyer gives four reasons why this view cannot work: (1) it cannot explain the presence of Moses and Elijah; (2) the verb ὁράω (to see; passive = to appear) is not limited to postresurrection events; (3) Jesus' glory is never mentioned in a resurrection account; and (4) the form does not match resurrection appearances. See also Bock 1987: 324 n. 98; H. Müller 1960: 60; Stein 1976.

31 In 1 Cor. 7:26 ἀνάγκη (distress) has a generalized eschatological force of drawing close to the end (BAGD 52 §2; BAA 102 §2), which equals the generalized description of desolation in Luke 21:20 (in 2 Cor. 6:4 and 12:10, ἀνάγκη lacks any eschatological force). The other term, ὀργή, often refers to divine wrath (BAGD 579 §2b; BAA 1173 §2b) and conceptually recalls Deut. 28:58–68, a covenantal curse passage (the phrase all the nations in Deut. 28:64 may recall the phrase to all the nations in Luke 21:24). See also Isa. 9:12 [9:11 MT]; Jer. 4:4; Ezek. 5:13; 30:3; 32:9; Rom. 2:8; 12:19; Eph. 2:3; 5:6; Col. 3:6; 1 Thess. 1:10; 5:9; Rev. 6:16, 17; 11:18; 14:10; 16:19; 19:15.

23 Ὥρμησεν in Matt. 8:32 = Mark 5:13 = Luke 8:33 means to rush irrationally or with some emotion; Fitzmyer 1981: 739; Bertram, TDNT 5:470; BAGD 581; BAA 1178; elsewhere only at Acts 7:57; 19:29. On ἀποπνίγω (to drown), see BAGD 97; BAA 195; elsewhere only Luke 8:7 (of thorns and thistles that choke); a related verb, συμπνίγω, occurs in 8:14, 42.

7 Βουνός (hill) is rare in the NT, both times being tied to an OT text: Luke 3:5 (Isa. 40:4) and Luke 23:30 (Hos. 10:8); BAGD 146; BAA 292; BDR §126.1b.5. In contrast, the synonymous ὄρος (mountain) appears sixty-three times in the NT.

28 Οὗτος (this one) represents contempt in Matt. 20:12; Luke 18:11; Acts 17:18; Jeremias 1963a: 131; BDF §290.6. It will reappear in Luke 23 as the characters discuss and rebuke Jesus (23:2, 35).

11 Οὗτος is derogatory in 18:11 and throughout the Lucan passion narrative: 23:4, 14, 22, 35 (except for 23:41).

18 The meaning of οὕτως is not clear (Marshall 1978: 905). Fitzmyer 1985: 1583 argues that it means “so” the Scripture speaks, referring to the manner of the message and thus focusing on its content. It could also be causative (Klostermann 1929: 242, pointing to 24:26), thus meaning “because” the Scripture must be fulfilled. Either possibility makes good sense; the second emphasizes design a little more.

10 For ὄχλος in Luke, see 4:42; 5:1, 3, 15, 19, 29; 6:17, 19; 7:9, 11, 12, 24; 8:4, 19, 40, 42, 45; 9:11, 12, 16, 18, 37, 38; 11:14, 27, 29; 12:1, 13, 54; 14:25; 18:36; 19:3, 39; 22:6, 47; 23:4, 48. In 8:40–56, ὄχλος is synonymous to λαός (people), as 8:47 shows. Ὄχλος recalls the interested group of 8:4, 19. Pointing to 8:47, Bovon 1989: 446 sees a more expectant crowd and speaks of their eschatological hope as they await Jesus, but the term is more neutral here. Schürmann 1969: 489 rightly speaks of their expectation of miracles, as Mark 6:53–56 indicates. See the exegesis of Luke 8:4.

5 Παιδεύω here refers to flogging; BAGD 604 §2bγ; BAA 1222 §2bγ; elsewhere in the NT with this meaning only at Luke 23:22; cf. 1 Kings 12:11, 14; 2 Chron. 10:11, 14. Mark 15:15 uses φραγελλώσας for the whipping before the crucifixion. Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28 distinguishes three types of flogging: fustes, flagella, and verbera. He may be right that Luke refers to fustigatio in terms of Pilate’s initial intention, but when he gave Jesus over, the verberatio would be administered for crucifixion. R. Brown 1994: 851 questions the value of these distinctions and whether Luke’s audience would know them. Regardless, the punishment came with the crucifixion.

8 Lachs 1987: 328 argues that the alternation of βρέφος and παιδίον may have behind it a Semitic term that includes both age groups.

17 Παραβιάζομαι usually means “to use force” on someone, but here “quiet persuasion” is meant, which is similar to the use of the unprefixed form in the difficult 16:16. On the importance of hospitality in Judaism, see Philo, On Abraham 22 §§107–13; Josephus, Antiquities 1.11.2 §196.

8 Παραβολήν (parable) is singular, as in 5:36, where it also referred to more than one parable. Marshall 1978: 600 suggests that it means “a parabolic discourse.”

12 As usual for Luke’s Gospel (four of seven occurrences), παρεκάλει is imperfect: “he was beseeching [him].” On such requests, see Matt. 8:5; 14:36 = Mark 6:56; Matt. 26:53; Mark 1:40; 5:18; 7:32; 8:22; Luke 7:4; Schmitz, TDNT 5:794 §F1.

8 The more intensive ἀποκρύπτω (to conceal) is used in contrast to unveiling (ἀποκαλύπτω) revelation and the mystery of God’s plan (Luke 10:21; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). Luke uses the synonymous παρακαλύπτω (to conceal) in Luke 9:45 and κρύπτω (to hide) in 19:42 (Marshall 1978: 691).

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός (stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός (stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός (stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

32 Παρατίθημι (to give over) occurs elsewhere of divine protection at Luke 12:48; Acts 14:23; 20:32; 1 Pet. 4:19; Ps. 31:5 [30:6 LXX]; cf. 1 Tim. 1:18; 2 Tim. 2:2; Tob. 1:14; 4:1, 20; 1 Macc. 9:35; BAGD 623 §2bβ; BAA 1258–59 §2bβ. The reference to Jesus' πνεῦμα (spirit) indicates his person; BAGD 674 §2; BAA 1355–56 §2; Matt. 27:50 = John 19:30; Luke 8:55; Acts 7:59; Rom. 1:4; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 12:23; 1 Pet. 3:18–19; Rev. 11:11.

4 Παρῆσαν (arrived), from πάρειμι (to arrive; BAGD 624 §1a; BAA 1261 §1), refers to the crowd's arrival, not only its presence as many translations suggest; so correctly Plummer 1896: 337; Acts 10:21; 12:20; 17:6; 24:19, Marshall 1978: 553. In addition, ἀπαγγέλλω (to announce) usually refers to recent news; Marshall 1978: 553; Matt. 2:8; 28:8, 11; Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; Mark 16:10, 13; Luke 7:18; BAGD 79; BAA 157.

8 Παρέρχομαι usually has a figurative sense of passing by in the sense of neglecting or passing from the scene (11:42; 15:29; 16:17; 21:33). Here it means to physically pass by (also Matt. 8:28; Mark 6:48); BAGD 625; BAA 1264; also Exod. 12:23. The parallel Matt. 20:30 has παράγει (is passing by).

3 Carson cites texts where πάσχα can mean Passover week: Josephus, Antiquities 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; Jewish War 2.1.3 §10; m. Pesaḥ. 9.5.

1 The term passion is a wordplay on Hebrew פֶּסַח (Pesaḥ., Passover) and Greek πάσχω (paschō, to suffer); Fitzmyer 1985: 1369; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.10.1.

23 On περιποιέω (to gain), see BAGD 650; BAA 1310; Gen. 12:12; Exod. 1:16; elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13. On ζῳογονέω (to preserve alive), see BAGD 341; BAA 690; Exod. 1:17; Judg. 8:19; 1 Sam. 2:6; elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 7:19; 1 Tim. 6:13; Bultmann, TDNT 2:873–74.

24 Cf. εὑρίσκω (to find) in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25 and σῴζω (to save) in Luke 9:24 = Mark 8:35. Geiger 1972: 121 speaks of the influence of Ezek. 13:18–19 (which uses περιποιέω), and Zmijewski 1976: 479 n. 56 sees a connection to Exod. 1:17 (which uses ζῳογονέω). Neither LXX reference satisfies, however, since each has only one element of Luke 17:33, and one can hardly argue for a double LXX allusion. In addition, if the LXX alteration is based on an earlier, existing traditional saying, what does it add? Περιποιέω appears only three times in the NT (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13) and the noun περιποίησις is never used in the Gospels (five times elsewhere). Since the conscious shift of terminology appears to have no point, the rare terminology is probably from a source.

16 The use of εἰ (if) plus ἄν (untranslated particle) yields a mixed condition; Arndt 1956: 369; BDF §372.1a. On the idiom πίστιν ἔχειν (to have faith), see 4 Macc. 16:22; Matt. 17:20; 21:21 = Mark 11:22; Acts 14:9; Rom. 14:2 (conceptually); 1 Cor. 13:2; 1 Tim. 1:19; 3:9; Philem. 5; James 2:1, 14, 18; Hanse, TDNT 2:826 n. 58.

11 Ῥύμη is a side street (BAGD 737; BAA 1476; Isa. 15:3; Tob. 13:17–18; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11; 12:10) versus πλατεῖα, a wide street (BAGD 666; BAA 1340; in the Gospels and Acts at Matt. 6:5; 12:19; Luke 10:10; 13:26; Acts 5:15).

32 Παρατίθημι (to give over) occurs elsewhere of divine protection at Luke 12:48; Acts 14:23; 20:32; 1 Pet. 4:19; Ps. 31:5 [30:6 LXX]; cf. 1 Tim. 1:18; 2 Tim. 2:2; Tob. 1:14; 4:1, 20; 1 Macc. 9:35; BAGD 623 §2bβ; BAA 1258–59 §2bβ. The reference to Jesus' πνεῦμα (spirit) indicates his person; BAGD 674 §2; BAA 1355–56 §2; Matt. 27:50 = John 19:30; Luke 8:55; Acts 7:59; Rom. 1:4; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 12:23; 1 Pet. 3:18–19; Rev. 11:11.

5 Πόλις is used in its broadest sense of inhabited area here and refers to a village; BAGD 685; BAA 1375 §1; Bovon 1989: 360–61 notes the present size of Nein, as does Schürmann 1969: 399.

46 See the use of πορεύω in 4:42; 7:6, 11; 9:51, 52, 56, 57; 13:33; 17:11; 22:22, 39; 24:28; Fitzmyer 1981: 539; Ernst 1977: 174–75. “Jesus’ hour had not yet come”; Nolland 1989: 201.

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

6 The word for begging, ἐπαιτέω, is rare in the NT: elsewhere only Luke 16:3 and Mark 10:46 variant; also Ps. 109:10 [108:10 LXX]; Sir. 40:28; BAGD 282; BAA 571. Mark 10:46 uses προσαίτης (beggar), which appears elsewhere only in John 9:8; BAGD 711; BAA 1425.

14 One other Synoptic difference needs notation. Luke uses what some see as the narrower term for petition: δέησις. The distinction that δέησις = petition and προσευχή = prayer is not present in the NT, and the reference in 5:33 appears to be general. For the distinction, see Greeven, TDNT 2:807, though he acknowledges that it is harder to argue for the distinction in nouns.

50 Luke often emphasizes prayer for the disciple: δέομαι in Luke 5:12; 8:38; 9:38, 40; 22:32; Acts 4:31; 8:22, 24; and προσεύχομαι in Luke 1:10; 3:21; 5:16; 6:12; 11:1 [twice]; 18:1; Acts 1:24; 8:15; Zmijewski 1972: 289. Constant prayer is called for at Luke 18:1, 7–8; Rom. 12:12; and 1 Thess. 5:17.

22 Bovon 1989: 200 n. 36. Προσκυνέω is also found in Acts 7:43; 8:27; 10:25; 24:11. It always has a religious force for Luke. Ἐνώπιον with a genitive is common in Luke (twenty-two times, including 1:15, 17, 19, 75, 76; 5:18, 25; Plummer 1896: 112).

13 Προστίθημι (to add) is also Lucan, appearing thirteen times in Luke–Acts and only three times in the other Gospels; Schneider 1977a: 347; Isa. 26:15. As Fitzmyer 1985: 1143 notes, the apostles would already have had some faith, so the idea is to add faith (against BAGD 719 §2; BAA 1440 §2).

7 Creed 1930: 229 says that the use of the optative in an indirect question and the use of πυνθάνομαι (to inquire) are Lucan (only three NT uses of πυνθάνομαι are non-Lucan: Luke 15:26; Acts 4:7; 10:18, 29; 21:33; 23:19, 20, 34; Matt. 2:4; John 4:52; 13:24); BAGD 729; BAA 1459.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB 1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

17 The phrase πῦρ καὶ θεῖον (fire and sulfur) occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Rev. 9:17, 18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8; BAGD 353; BAA 718; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10 §56. It is apocalyptic-judgment language whose concepts reflect the apocalyptic-prophetic teaching of Jesus.

14 Matthew uses κύριε, while Mark uses the Semitic ῥαββουνί (rabbi). Luke never uses ῥαββουνί (only Mark 10:51 and John 20:16) or the related ῥαββί (fifteen times in Matthew, Mark, and John); BAGD 733; BAA 1467.

14 Matthew uses κύριε, while Mark uses the Semitic ῥαββουνί (rabbi). Luke never uses ῥαββουνί (only Mark 10:51 and John 20:16) or the related ῥαββί (fifteen times in Matthew, Mark, and John); BAGD 733; BAA 1467.

12 The expression is used only here in the NT. Matt. 19:24 = Mark 10:25 has ῥαφίς, which always refers to a sewing needle; BAGD 734; BAA 1470 (in the NT only in these parallels). For other exaggerations by Jesus, see Luke 6:41; 17:2; Ernst 1977: 504.

12 For ῥήματα as events see Gen. 24:66; Luke 2:19, 51; Klostermann 1929: 24. It can also refer to words (1 Sam. 3:1, 7).

11 Ῥύμη is a side street (BAGD 737; BAA 1476; Isa. 15:3; Tob. 13:17–18; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11; 12:10) versus πλατεῖα, a wide street (BAGD 666; BAA 1340; in the Gospels and Acts at Matt. 6:5; 12:19; Luke 10:10; 13:26; Acts 5:15).

11 Carson 1984: 112. In Bovon's short excursus (1989: 196–97) on the term devil, he notes that Luke uses διάβολος and σατανᾶς seven times each in Luke–Acts. The reference to διάβολος in Luke 4:2 is possibly Luke's choice, though Matt. 4:1, 8 renders this judgment as less than certain. Matt. 4:3 uses ὁ πειράζων and Matt. 4:10 σατανᾶ, which Luke lacks. In 4:1–13, Luke speaks only of the διάβολος, avoiding Matthew's variation of terms and Mark's reference to Satan.

13 Λαῖλαψ may be onomatopoetic; so Arndt 1956: 327; Job 21:18; 38:1. The other NT uses are Mark 4:37 and 2 Pet. 2:17; BAGD 462–63; BAA

940. Matt. 8:24 uses σεισμός (earthquake or storm), a term that may make apocalyptic associations with the event; BAGD 746; BAA 1493.

10 It is difficult to know if Luke's σήμερον (today) refers to morning or late evening. On the time of the cock crowings, see Kosmala 1963–68. If an evening crowing is meant, it is about 3:00 a.m.; if morning, then it is sunrise.

12 Σιωπάω, a favorite term for Mark (3:4; 4:39; 9:34; 10:48; 14:61), occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 20:31; 26:63; Luke 1:20; Acts 18:9; BAGD 752; BAA 1504. See the additional note for a textual issue that influences this point.

42 On σκανδαλίζω as a term of gospel rejection, see Matt. 11:6 = Luke 7:23; Matt. 13:57; 24:10; as a term for a "believer" stumbling into apostasy, see Matt. 18:6 = Mark 9:42 = Luke 17:1–2 (which see for details).

20 Σκηνή is the OT term used for "booths" and alludes to the picture of blessing that was tied to celebrating the exodus; Lev. 23:34. See also Mark 9:5; Rev. 7:15; 21:3; 1 Enoch 39.4; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 2:11. On the eschatological use of σκηνή (booths or habitations), see Michaelis, TDNT 7:378–79. T. Schmidt 1987: 154–55 argues that the passage refers neither to alms nor to the generous use of money, but to a prudent person acting in a "critical impermanent situation with that which has been entrusted to him in order to gain lasting benefits." This may be the broad application if one had just this one verse, but the Lucan context suggests that using money generously is a central concern.

6 Στάσις means "rebellion or uprising" elsewhere at Mark 15:7; Luke 23:25; Acts 19:40 (elsewhere in the NT at Acts 15:2; 23:7, 10; 24:5; Heb.

9:8; BAGD 764 §2; BAA 1526 §2). This is the only NT expression of periphrasis with ἦν (was) and an aorist participle; BDR §355.1; BDF §355.1; Plummer 1896: 526 (although א* in John 18:30 also has this construction).

11 On lifting the eyes in prayer, see Mark 6:41; 7:34; John 11:41; 17:1; Ps. 123:1; 1 Esdr. 4:58 (in 1 Enoch 13.5 evil angels are too ashamed to look up); Jeremias, TDNT 1:185–86; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377 n. 11. Lifting the hands is a symbol of supplication in the NT; 1 Tim. 2:8. Στῆθος (breast) stands for the person; BAGD 767 and BAA 1532 (“the seat of the inner life”); elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 23:48; John 13:25; 21:20; Rev. 15:6. Jeremias 1963a: 141 at n. 46 says that in Judaism the heart is seen as the seat of sin, but cites as evidence only the late Eccles. Rab. 7.2.5 on 7:2.

15 On συναρπάζω, see BAGD 785; BAA 1566; elsewhere only at Acts 6:12; 19:29; 27:15 (of a ship caught in a storm).

11 Both verbs appear only here and in the parallel at Matt. 21:44. On συνθλάω, see BAGD 790; BAA 1575; Ps. 57:7 LXX [58:6 Engl.]; Mic. 3:3. On λικμάω, see BAGD 474–75; BAA 963; Dan. 2:44 [Theodotion]; Ruth 3:2; Job 27:21; Isa. 17:13; Jer. 38:10 LXX [31:10 Engl.]; Amos 9:9; Josephus, Antiquities 5.9.3 §328.

10 Luke uses σῴζω (to save) thirty times, including 7:50; 8:12, 48, 50; 9:24 (twice); 13:23; 19:10. Ironic uses occur in Luke 23:35 (twice), 37, 39. The term also occurs in Acts 2:21; 4:9, 12; 14:9; 15:11.

24 Cf. εὑρίσκω (to find) in Matt. 10:39 and 16:25 and σῴζω (to save) in Luke 9:24 = Mark 8:35. Geiger 1972: 121 speaks of the influence of Ezek. 13:18–19 (which uses περιποιέω), and Zmijewski 1976: 479 n. 56 sees a connection to Exod. 1:17 (which uses ζῳογονέω). Neither LXX reference satisfies, however, since each has only one element of Luke 17:33, and one can hardly argue for a double LXX allusion. In addition, if the LXX alteration is based on an earlier, existing traditional saying, what does it add? Περιποιέω appears only three times in the NT (Acts 20:28; 1 Tim. 3:13) and the noun περιποίησις is never used in the Gospels (five times elsewhere). Since the conscious shift of terminology appears to have no point, the rare terminology is probably from a source.

30 Σῶμα (normally "body") means "corpse" in Luke 23:52, 55; 24:3, 23; Acts 9:40; BAGD 799 §1a; BAA 1593 §1a.

5 Τελειόω (to complete) is a key NT term for the completion of God's plan: Luke 12:50; 22:37; John 19:30; and Heb. 2:10; 5:8–9; 7:28 (though in Hebrews it has the additional nuance of perfecting).

2 The idea of fulfilling Scripture occurs throughout Luke's writings, frequently with τελέω (BAGD 811 §1, esp. §2; BAA 1617 §2; Luke 2:39; 12:50; 18:31; 22:37; Acts 13:29) or δεῖ (Luke 9:22; 17:25); also Luke 13:22, 32; 24:44–49; Acts 2:23. Delling, TDNT 8:60 n. 16, says that this emphasis is part of special Lucan material.

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

47 On the elements of Lucan and non-Lucan style in the verse, see Schürmann 1969: 227 n. 45. He argues that the name Nazareth and the reference to Jesus' being reared in Nazareth are not Lucan, since ἀνατρέφω is used in Acts 7:20–21 and 22:3. Τρέφω (to rear) occurs only here in the NT with this meaning, though Luke 23:29; Rev. 12:6, 14 are close in sense: "to nourish, nurture" (BAGD 825; BAA 1645–46).

17 Schürmann 1969: 291 n. 28 notes that Mark and Matthew reflect an Aramaism with οἱ ἰσχύοντες. If so, the alteration of wording is Luke's rendering of the figure. The other difference is that Matt. 9:12 and Mark 2:17 agree against Luke in their introductions to Jesus' saying: "and hearing, Jesus/he said," versus Luke's "and replying, Jesus said to them." All the Synoptic writers use ἰσχύω (Matthew four times, Mark four times, Luke eight times in his Gospel and six times in Acts), but Luke is the only Gospel writer to use ὑγιαίνω (Luke 5:31; 7:10; 15:27). Two of Luke's three uses have Synoptic parallels.

14 Glickman 1983: 226–27. Nolland 1989: 179 says that the test is exploitation of Jesus' privilege of sonship, since the Son has access to the powers of the Father. "Son of God" here has a special force for Jesus' unique filial relationship to God, since Jesus can access such power. But C. F. Evans 1990: 258 ties υἱός to 3:22, so that it means "servant of God" or "king." Nolland's view is more likely. Satan is not testing regal authority, but something more significant.

9 An argument for a Matthean conflation of preresurrection and postresurrection titles here is unnecessary, since sonship to God is an OT regal image: Ps. 2; against Fitzmyer 1981: 774, who argues that χριστός is preresurrection and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος (Son of the living God) is postresurrection.

15 To indicate sleep, Luke uses ὕπνος (BAGD 843; BAA 1679; elsewhere in Luke's writings twice in Acts 20:9) and βαρέω (to be heavy; BAGD 133; BAA 267; elsewhere in Luke's writings only in Luke 21:34). In 22:45–46, Luke uses the synonymous κοιμάω and καθεύδω. It is clear that the disciples are in deep sleep, for the phrase βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ translates literally as "weighed down with sleep." Balz, TDNT 8:554, speaks of disciples "drunk with sleep." Bovon's term "second consciousness” (1989: 498) is too visionary in force. He cites Gen. 15:12; Dan. 8:18; 10:9.

60 Hendriksen 1978: 362. Schürmann 1969: 372 notes that the second-person speech is against an original reference to the Pharisees, since they are rebuked in this way only in Luke 14:7–11. In addition, the term ὑποκριτής is not always used of Pharisees, as Matt. 24:51 and Luke 12:56 show. He sees the address as to the disciples, but not limited to them.

21 Wilckens, TDNT 8:566–67, notes that ὑποκριτής is always a negative address in the NT: in Matthew fourteen times (seven of which are in Matt. 23); elsewhere only four times (Luke 6:42; here; 13:15; Mark 7:6).

29 The term ὑποστρέφω is used thirty-two times in Luke–Acts and three times in the rest of the NT (Gal. 1:17; Heb. 7:1; 2 Pet. 2:21). Considered alongside the use of σύν, this verb may show 1:56 to be a Lucan linkage.

37 Matt. 24:45 = Luke 12:42 uses φρόνιμος to describe a steward in another parable who thought ahead and lived in light of his master’s return; so also Matt. 7:24; 25:2, 4, 8, 9; BAGD 866; BAA 1728.

8 Normally meaning “to guard” (BAGD 868 §1f; BAA 1731 §1f), φυλάσσω here means to keep or obey the law; Lev. 20:22; 26:3; Ps. 119:5 [118:5 LXX]; Wis. 6:4; Sir. 21:11; 4 Macc. 5:29; T. Judah 26.1; T. Iss. 5.1; Luke 11:28.

5 On the use of φωνή (voice), see Luke 11:27; Acts 4:24; Gen. 39:15, 18; Judg. 21:2; 1 Sam. 11:4; Van Der Loos 1965: 496 n. 4; Klostermann 1929: 173. The call for mercy is also used in the Psalter (e.g., 109:21; Glö;ckner 1983: 139–40), but not much can be made of this general expression, as Nolland 1993a: 846 indicates.

27 Joy (χαρά) is a Lucan theme: Luke 1:14; 2:10; 8:13; 10:17; 15:7, 10; 24:41; Acts 8:8; 12:14; 13:52; 15:3. Osborne 1984: 140 notes that in Luke's writings joy is a present experience shared to the degree of one's participation in events.

27 The four terms are χωλός (lame), used fourteen times in the NT, six times in Luke–Acts (e.g., Luke 7:22; 14:13, 21); κυλλός (maimed), used four times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 15:30–31), not used by Luke; παραλυτικός (stricken with palsy, paralytic), used ten times in the NT (e.g., Matt. 4:24), not used by Luke; and παραλελυμένος (paralytic), a perfect passive participle of παραλύω, used five times in the NT, four of which are in Luke–Acts (Luke 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). See Van Der Loos 1965: 436 n. 3.

12 Ἀνάπειρος probably describes the severely maimed or mutilated (BAGD 59; BAA 117; LSJ 116; elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 14:21), as opposed to χωλός, which refers to all the lame (BAGD 889; BAA 1772; Plummer 1896: 359).

9 Ψηλαφάω occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 17:27; Heb. 12:18; 1 John 1:1 (BAGD 892; BAA 1779–80); cf. Gen. 27:12; Judg. 16:26; Ignatius, Smyrneans 3.2. Plummer 1896: 560 wonders if 1 John 1:1 knows of this event, given its use of this rare term. See also C. F. Evans 1970: 108–9.

11 Jesus uses two monetary terms: the hapax legomenon δαπάνη (BAGD 171; BAA 341; MM 137), which refers to the expenses of a given enterprise, and ψηφίζω (to count) (BAGD 892; BAA 1780; elsewhere in the NT only at Rev. 13:18). This last term often means to count with pebbles and can also mean to vote or make a calculated choice; MM 698.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

4 Ὥρα (hour) occurs many times in the passion narrative, including Mark 14:35, 41; John 12:23; 13:1; 17:1; Luke 22:53. Because ὥρα carries no qualifiers (as in 22:53), it conveys no special sense of God's hour (against Grundmann 1963: 392 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1384; as noted by Marshall 1978: 794 and especially Soards 1987: 33).

24 Luke uses ὡσεί (about) frequently to show approximate time; Luke 3:23; 9:14 (twice), 28; 22:41, 59; 24:11; cf. Acts 2:15; 3:1; 10:3, 9; 23:23). Ἤδη (already) is also frequent: Matthew uses it seven times, Mark eight times, Luke ten times, elsewhere in the NT thirty-six times; Plummer 1896: 536; Untergassmair 1980: 85 n. 372.

12 In the OT, see 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; Ps. 80:8–19 [80:9–20 MT]; Isa. 5:1–7; 34:4; Jer. 5:17; 8:13; 24:1–8; Hos. 2:12 [2:14 MT]; 9:10; Joel 1:7; Mic. 4:4; 7:1; Hab. 3:17; Matt. 20:1–8; 21:28, 33–41 = Mark 12:1–9 = Luke 20:9–16. In Judaism, see Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 (Charles 1913: 2.775). The picture of caring for the vine makes the figure refer to God's blessings. Manson 1949: 274 notes that in rabbinic literature the fig-tree image often alluded to the law, but that is not its referent in this parable.

17 Marshall 1978: 555 cites the refusal in Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 and the small yield in ›Abot de Rabbi Nathan A.16 (= Goldin 1955: 86).

6 Luce 1933: 349 sees an allusion to Isa. 54:1, but since the images are so different (i.e., in Isaiah the barren will bear a child), this is probably not correct; correctly Marshall 1978: 864 (cf. Luke 1:7, 25; Gal. 4:27) and R. Brown 1994: 923, who cites parallels from Lam. 4:4; Wis. 3:13; Eccles. 4:2–3; 2 Bar. 10.6–10 and argues that Luke received the saying from a sayings source.

8 Some Jews believed that only a few of the truly righteous would experience immediate blessing, while the rest would wait in Gehenna for resurrection. Two verses in 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] (NRSV) are close to the tone of this question: "Many have been created, but only a few shall be saved" (8:3) and "The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of only a few" (8:1). See also 2 Bar. 21.11; 44.15; 48.23, 45–50; 51.1–6.

5 Bovon 1989: 179 n. 65. He notes Isa. 64:1 [63:19 MT]; T. Levi 18.6–7. One could add 3 Macc. 6:18; 2 Bar. 22.1; Traub, TDNT 5:530 n. 263. Also seeing the presence of apocalyptic elements is Witherington 1990: 149, who compares the text to Rev. 1 and defends the event's authenticity as a vision.

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ›Abot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

3 Similar settings are found in Luke 10:25–30; 12:13–15; 15:1–3. The idea is to share in eternal reward or eternal life. On the eschatological banquet in Judaism, see Exod. Rab. 25.7 on 16:4; 2 Bar. 29.8; 1 Enoch 25.5; Behm, TDNT 2:691.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

8 Some Jews believed that only a few of the truly righteous would experience immediate blessing, while the rest would wait in Gehenna for resurrection. Two verses in 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] (NRSV) are close to the tone of this question: “Many have been created, but only a few shall be saved” (8:3) and “The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of only a few” (8:1). See also 2 Bar. 21.11; 44.15; 48.23, 45–50; 51.1–6.

8 Some Jews believed that only a few of the truly righteous would experience immediate blessing, while the rest would wait in Gehenna for resurrection. Two verses in 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] (NRSV) are close to the tone of this question: “Many have been created, but only a few shall be saved” (8:3) and “The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of only a few" (8:1). See also 2 Bar. 21.11; 44.15; 48.23, 45–50; 51.1–6.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

8 Some Jews believed that only a few of the truly righteous would experience immediate blessing, while the rest would wait in Gehenna for resurrection. Two verses in 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] (NRSV) are close to the tone of this question: "Many have been created, but only a few shall be saved" (8:3) and "The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of only a few" (8:1). See also 2 Bar. 21.11; 44.15; 48.23, 45–50; 51.1–6.

9 Michaelis, TDNT 4:247–48, describes the image as one of heavenly glory; so ἐξαστράπτων (gleaming like lightning); Ezek. 1:4, 7. Conceptual parallels occur in Ezek. 1:27–28; Dan. 10:6; Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10; Rev. 2:17; 6:2; 20:11; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:97; 1 Enoch 38.4; 104.2; 2 Bar. 51.

8 Some Jews believed that only a few of the truly righteous would experience immediate blessing, while the rest would wait in Gehenna for resurrection. Two verses in 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] (NRSV) are close to the tone of this question: “Many have been created, but only a few shall be saved” (8:3) and “The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of only a few” (8:1). See also 2 Bar. 21.11; 44.15; 48.23, 45–50; 51.1–6.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ʾ*Abot* 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah’s mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6; 1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

21 Creed 1930: 207 adopts this meaning, but regards it as unlikely that Jesus said it. On the endurance of the law in Judaism, see Bar. 4:1; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 9.37; 2 Bar. 77.15.

40 1 Macc. 11:43; 1 Enoch 5.4; BAGD 126–27; BAA 254; Schlier, TDNT 1:513. Braun, TDNT 6:252, says that ἀφίστημι means apostasy.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985: 959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called "annihilationism" today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner's fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

11 On lifting the eyes in prayer, see Mark 6:41; 7:34; John 11:41; 17:1; Ps. 123:1; 1 Esdr. 4:58 (in 1 Enoch 13.5 evil angels are too ashamed to look up); Jeremias, TDNT 1:185–86; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377 n. 11. Lifting the hands is a symbol of supplication in the NT; 1 Tim. 2:8. Στῆθος (breast) stands for the person; BAGD 767 and BAA 1532 ("the seat of the inner life”); elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 23:48; John 13:25; 21:20; Rev. 15:6. Jeremias 1963a: 141 at n. 46 says that in Judaism the heart is seen as the seat of sin, but cites as evidence only the late Eccles. Rab. 7.2.5 on 7:2.

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985: 959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called “annihilationism” today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner’s fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 (“spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming”); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279. In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

51 1 Enoch 40.9 names four angels: Michael, Raphael, Gabriel (the angel of strength), and Phanuel (alternately called Uriel); 1 Enoch 20 names these four as well as Saraqael, Raguel, and Suruel (Gabriel is described as caring for the Garden of Eden and the cherubim). See Tob. 12:15; Fitzmyer 1981: 327–28; Bousset 1926: 325–31; SB 2:89–97.

22 Torment in both the intermediate state and the resurrection is found in Jewish (1 Enoch 22) and early Christian texts (2 Clem. 10.4; 17.7). In the 2 Clement texts the torture of hell is presented quite vividly as physical suffering.

32 Van Der Loos 1965: 572 cites OT precedent (Judg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 30:12); more correct is Schneider 1977a: 199. In Judaism, see 1 Enoch 22.1–14; 39.4–8. Nolland 1989: 422 notes a possible contact with 1 Kings 17:21–22.

18 1 Enoch 22.10–11 speaks of a place for the dead who have sinned and yet have received a proper interment; SB 2:227. Not unlike Jesus’ warning, 1 Enoch 103.5–8 delivers a stinging indictment of wealthy Sadducees who live extravagantly only to descend to Sheol.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

3 Similar settings are found in Luke 10:25–30; 12:13–15; 15:1–3. The idea is to share in eternal reward or eternal life. On the eschatological banquet in Judaism, see Exod. Rab. 25.7 on 16:4; 2 Bar. 29.8; 1 Enoch 25.5; Behm, TDNT 2:691.

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985: 959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called "annihilationism" today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner's fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

9 Michaelis, TDNT 4:247–48, describes the image as one of heavenly glory; so ἐξαστράπτων (gleaming like lightning); Ezek. 1:4, 7. Conceptual parallels occur in Ezek. 1:27–28; Dan. 10:6; Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10; Rev. 2:17; 6:2; 20:11; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:97; 1 Enoch 38.4; 104.2; 2 Bar. 51.

20 Σκηνή is the OT term used for “booths” and alludes to the picture of blessing that was tied to celebrating the exodus; Lev. 23:34. See also Mark 9:5; Rev. 7:15; 21:3; 1 Enoch 39.4; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 2:11. On the eschatological use of σκηνή (booths or habitations), see Michaelis, TDNT 7:378–79. T. Schmidt 1987: 154–55 argues that the passage refers neither to alms nor to the generous use of money, but to a prudent person acting in a “critical impermanent situation with that which has been entrusted to him in order to gain lasting benefits.” This may be the broad application if one had just this one verse, but the Lucan context suggests that using money generously is a central concern.

32 Van Der Loos 1965: 572 cites OT precedent (Judg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 30:12); more correct is Schneider 1977a: 199. In Judaism, see 1 Enoch 22.1–14; 39.4–8. Nolland 1989: 422 notes a possible contact with 1 Kings 17:21–22.

51 1 Enoch 40.9 names four angels: Michael, Raphael, Gabriel (the angel of strength), and Phanuel (alternately called Uriel); 1 Enoch 20 names these four as well as Saraqael, Raguel, and Suruel (Gabriel is described as caring for the Garden of Eden and the cherubim). See Tob. 12:15; Fitzmyer 1981: 327–28; Bousset 1926: 325–31; SB 2:89–97.

36 On “wisdom’s children,” see Sir. 4:11; Prov. 8:32–33. On wisdom personified, see Prov. 1:20–33; 8:1–9:6; 1 Enoch 42; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:10; Wis. 7:22–11:1; Schürmann 1969: 427; Nolland 1989: 346.

12 Bultmann 1963: 114 sees wisdom here. Leaney 1958: 210 cites Matt. 23:34; Luke 2:40, 52; 7:35; 11:31, 49 as parallels. See also 1 Enoch 42. Luke 11:49–51 uses the wisdom motif openly. For more reasons not to see wisdom here, see Bock 1987: 120. Marshall 1978: 573–74 and Fitzmyer 1985: 1034 opt for wisdom terminology, but without Jesus alluding to himself as wisdom, since Jesus sees himself as wisdom's messenger. Sir. 24:7–12 provides a plausible background. If wisdom is in the background, this is the best way to argue for it. Nolland 1993a: 739 questions the presence of wisdom here, as do I.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

13 On Jesus as bearer of God's wisdom, see Luke 7:35; 10:21–22; 1 Cor. 1:24, 30. On the Son of Man as bringer of wisdom, see 1 Enoch 49.1–3; Grundmann 1963: 242.

26 1 Chron. 17:16 is not an exception to this belief. David's sitting before (not by) the Lord alludes to a worshipful dialogue involving submission, and the nonheavenly scene does not contrast Jesus' claims. The language is less direct than Jesus' explicit claim. Only Moses (Ezekiel the Tragedian) and the Son of Man (1 Enoch 51.3; 61.8) might be exceptions.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

13 This may also be the significance of the request in Luke 8:31 not to be sent into the abyss; Van Der Loos 1965: 387 n. 4. 1 Enoch 56.3; T. Moses 10.11–12; and T. Levi 18 reflect such an eschatological judgment (the T. Moses reference is disputed; see J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.932, 933 n. g).

26 1 Chron. 17:16 is not an exception to this belief. David's sitting before (not by) the Lord alludes to a worshipful dialogue involving submission, and the nonheavenly scene does not contrast Jesus' claims. The language is less direct than Jesus' explicit claim. Only Moses (Ezekiel the Tragedian) and the Son of Man (1 Enoch 51.3; 61.8) might be exceptions.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

36 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 9:29–33; Plummer 1896: 220. The imagery of 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 8:41–44 is close to this parable; Fitzmyer 1981: 712; Schürmann 1969: 463 n. 131. 1 Enoch 62.8 speaks of sowing saints.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a “heavenly,” redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ʾ*Abot* 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–

9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

11 Schürmann 1969: 164 n. 21. On "coming wrath" in Judaism, see Jub. 15.34; Ps. Sol. 15.4; 1 Enoch 84.4–6; C. F. Evans 1990: 239.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

19 Grundmann 1963: 209; Ernst 1977: 332; also 1 Enoch 89.14, 18–20, 55; 90.6–17; Sir. 13:17 ("how can wolf and lamb agree? / just so with sinner and devout" [NJB]); 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:18.

19 Grundmann 1963: 209; Ernst 1977: 332; also 1 Enoch 89.14, 18–20, 55; 90.6–17; Sir. 13:17 ("how can wolf and lamb agree? / just so with sinner and devout" [NJB]); 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:18.

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

14 On the negative portrayal of dogs in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 89.42–43, 47, 49; B. Scott 1989: 151; Michel, TDNT 3:1103. For the view that this is a positive act, see Zahn 1920: 585.

19 Grundmann 1963: 209; Ernst 1977: 332; also 1 Enoch 89.14, 18–20, 55; 90.6–17; Sir. 13:17 (“how can wolf and lamb agree? / just so with sinner and devout” [NJB]); 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:18.

6 For a methodological assessment of this debate, see R. Miller 1991. Sanders is unaware of Eppstein’s 1964 article (see n. 1). Some in Judaism saw the temple as corrupt; 1 Enoch 89.73–90.29; 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.1–12. Meier 1994: 886 rightly calls the cleansing “prophetic action,” but opts for a rejection of the temple rather than a cleansing. This ignores the connection to Isa. 56.

19 Grundmann 1963: 209; Ernst 1977: 332; also 1 Enoch 89.14, 18–20, 55; 90.6–17; Sir. 13:17 (“how can wolf and lamb agree? / just so with sinner and devout” [NJB]); 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 5:18.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985:

959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called “annihilationism” today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner’s fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh’s activity, not Messiah’s; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

2 Because the exact list of names is so uncertain and because Luke says nothing about the structure, one should be cautious about invoking such precise symbolism. Wiefel 1988: 97 seems to regard this twelfth-week view as possible. Schürmann 1969: 203 n. 119 argues that if it is present Luke is not conscious of it. Nolland 1989: 168 suggests that it was the point of Luke's source, whose order he reversed. But how can one know this? Goulder 1989: 284–85 is strongly supportive of this view, citing 1 Enoch 93.3–10 to stress that the form is to some extent artificial.

2 Abraham is the root in 1 Enoch 93.5. The parable is not unlike Paul's vine image in Rom. 11. Though related to Israel as "natural branches," this promise is tied to God's commitment to Abraham and encompasses, but is not limited to, Israel (Luke 1:54–55). See Burns 1992 on Rom. 11.

7 Tiede 1988: 233; Ernst 1977: 398; Fitzmyer 1985: 970; Lev. 19:18. Manson 1949: 271 notes the similar OT perspective: Job 31:24–25; Ps. 49; Eccles. 2:1–11. Note also T. Judah 18–19; Sir. 11:18–19; 1 Enoch 97.8–10; Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14; B. Scott 1989: 131–32.

8 This stands in contrast to Prov. 11:26; Jer. 17:11; 1 Enoch 97.8–10. Sir. 11:18–19 is especially close to Jesus' picture, except that wealth comes through self-denial and diligence (lit., "from afflicting himself"), not simply fortune as in Luke. The LXX renders the key phrase "by his wariness and pinching," referring to frugality; Schweizer 1984: 207. Note also Ps. 49:16–20 [49:17–21 MT]; Plummer 1896: 323; Fitzmyer 1985: 972 (noting 1 Enoch 97.8–10, which rebukes unrighteous wealth); Nickelsburg 1978–79: 334–37. See n. 11 below for the Sirach and 1 Enoch texts.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: "One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, ‘I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!’ he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies.” 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: “Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, ‘We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.’ / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse” (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6; 1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

15 Marshall 1978: 548, though favorably disposed toward Q, admits the possibility of distinct sources. Matthew may well be speaking about an initial arrival of messianic woe; Isa. 34:5; 66:16; Ezek. 21; 1 Enoch 63.11; 91.12; 100.1–2; 2 Bar. 70.6; Ps. Sol. 17; Witherington 1990: 122–23.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6; 1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

5 On ὄρθρος (dawn), see BAGD 580; BAA 1176; elsewhere in the NT at John 8:2 and Acts 5:21; cf. Gospel of Peter 12.50 (= Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.225); T. Jos. 8.1; 1 Enoch 100.2. On βαθύς (deep), see BAGD 130 §2; BAA 263 §2; elsewhere in the NT at John 4:11; Acts 20:9; Rev. 2:24.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

6 The present participle οἱ σῳζόμενοι refers to those who are being delivered, but it looks to the future; Marshall 1978: 564; Isa. 37:32; 1 Enoch 102.7 [variant reading]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:66; Mark 10:26; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15.

7 1 Enoch 102.9–10 shows the Jewish contempt for the selfish rich. T. Moses 7.3 may apply to the Sadducees or Pharisees. Lachs 1987: 311–12 revives Manson's thesis and rejects the idea that this is a description of the Pharisees. On the Pharisees' relatively modesty means (not every lover of money succeeds in being rich), see Jeremias 1969: 259; Bammel, TDNT 6:901–2.

18 1 Enoch 22.10–11 speaks of a place for the dead who have sinned and yet have received a proper interment; SB 2:227. Not unlike Jesus' warning, 1 Enoch 103.5–8 delivers a stinging indictment of wealthy Sadducees who live extravagantly only to descend to Sheol.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

9 Michaelis, TDNT 4:247–48, describes the image as one of heavenly glory; so ἐξαστράπτων (gleaming like lightning); Ezek. 1:4, 7. Conceptual parallels occur in Ezek. 1:27–28; Dan. 10:6; Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10; Rev. 2:17; 6:2; 20:11; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:97; 1 Enoch 38.4; 104.2; 2 Bar. 51.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

22 On the expression the fathers in Judaism, see Schrenk, TDNT 5:976–77; 1 Esdr. 1:11 [1:12 LXX]; 4:60; 1 Macc. 2:19; 2 Enoch 33.12; 35.2. On the theme of holy graves, see Jeremias 1958a and 1961.

22 On the expression the fathers in Judaism, see Schrenk, TDNT 5:976–77; 1 Esdr. 1:11 [1:12 LXX]; 4:60; 1 Macc. 2:19; 2 Enoch 33.12; 35.2. On the theme of holy graves, see Jeremias 1958a and 1961.

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ›Abot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to "acts of mercy"; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, "My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures." The object of the last clause is not clear ("for heaven," "of benefits," "of souls," or "for myself in the world to come"), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

9 Paul's image of the olive tree in Rom. 11 is a variation on Jesus' picture. There the key point is not growth, but one's presence in the plant; Egelkraut 1976: 109; Jeremias 1963a: 147–49; Joseph and Asenath 15. On the verb κατασκηνόω (to live or nest), see BAGD 418 §2; BAA 851. Elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 13:32 = Mark 4:32; Acts 2:26.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985: 959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called "annihilationism" today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner's fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 ("spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming"); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279.

In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (gā‹ar, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (gĕ‹ar, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT]; 106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 921 notes other names used for Satan in Judaism: Belial (2 Cor. 6:15; 1QS 1.18, 24), Mast\;emah (1QS 3.23; 1QM 13.4; Jub. 10.8), and Asmodeus (Tob. 3:8, 17).

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the “two spirits” of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

11 Schürmann 1969: 164 n. 21. On “coming wrath” in Judaism, see Jub. 15.34; Ps. Sol. 15.4; 1 Enoch 84.4–6; C. F. Evans 1990: 239.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6;

1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various “books” mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

23 The penalty was apparently never carried out in Jesus' time since Jews did not have the right to execute capital punishment under Roman rule; Creed 1930: 208. The idea of such punishment still remains, as Jub. 30.8–9 shows. The standard was to pursue holiness. Such an act of adultery rendered a woman defiled (Jub. 33.9; m. Sot\;a 2.6; 5.1). In fact, these Mishnah texts almost require divorce for the adulterous wife since she becomes unclean to the husband. Thus, adultery was seen as extremely serious in Judaism (on the Greco-Roman view of adultery tied to shame, see Nolland 1993a: 818).

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

23 The penalty was apparently never carried out in Jesus' time since Jews did not have the right to execute capital punishment under Roman rule; Creed 1930: 208. The idea of such punishment still remains, as Jub. 30.8–9 shows. The standard was to pursue holiness. Such an act of adultery rendered a woman defiled (Jub. 33.9; m. Sot\;a 2.6; 5.1). In fact, these Mishnah texts almost require divorce for the adulterous wife since she becomes unclean to the husband. Thus, adultery was seen as extremely serious in Judaism (on the Greco-Roman view of adultery tied to shame, see Nolland 1993a: 818).

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

6 Jeremias objects that, if this theory is correct, the time advance is not one day but only four to six hours. He appeals to Jub. 49.10, 19, and Philo, Special Laws 2.27 §145, to argue against an evening sacrifice.

6 Jeremias objects that, if this theory is correct, the time advance is not one day but only four to six hours. He appeals to Jub. 49.10, 19, and Philo, Special Laws 2.27 §145, to argue against an evening sacrifice.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

9 For OT prophetic suffering, see 1 Kings 18:4, 13; 19:10, 14; 2 Chron. 24:21; Jer. 2:30; 26:20–23; 38:4–6; Amos 7:10–17; Josephus, Antiquities 10.3.1 §38; Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 5.1–14; Acts 7:52.

15 In Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 5.14, Isaiah quietly endures being sawed in two. Other ancients quietly accepting death are Socrates (Plato, Apology 39c) and Stoic philosophers (Epictetus 1.19.8); see Daube 1961: 61–65.

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

6 Bovon 1989: 66–67 (also n. 13) speaks of Isaiah and the development of Jewish speculation like Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Isaac and Moses (Biblical Antiquities 8–9) and Philo's view of Isaac (Cherubim 12–15 §§40–52), though Bovon notes that for Philo this detail was allegorical. One could add Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Samson's birth (Biblical Antiquities 42). None of these accounts are virgin births: they only supply details of the event not in the original accounts. Bovon also argues for Hellenistic influence. C. F. Evans 1990: 156–57 surveys divine paternity in the ancient world, but denies its value for this passage. He prefers to speak of a retrojection, which means he thinks later reflection has produced the tradition.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40

§§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

6 Bovon 1989: 66–67 (also n. 13) speaks of Isaiah and the development of Jewish speculation like Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Isaac and Moses (Biblical Antiquities 8–9) and Philo's view of Isaac (Cherubim 12–15 §§40–52), though Bovon notes that for Philo this detail was allegorical. One could add Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Samson's birth (Biblical Antiquities 42). None of these accounts are virgin births: they only supply details of the event not in the original accounts. Bovon also argues for Hellenistic influence. C. F. Evans 1990: 156–57 surveys divine paternity in the ancient world, but denies its value for this passage. He prefers to speak of a retrojection, which means he thinks later reflection has produced the tradition.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

7 BAGD 462 mentions this meaning, though it does not place Luke 1:22 here; BAA 938. For idols, the emphasis is on their inability to answer, but this is a function of more than being unable to speak. See also Philo, Special Laws 4.38 §197. Sibylline Oracles 4.27–28 also refers to idols.

15 Δίκτυα is also plural, indicating that there is a crew on this boat. On the use of δίκτυον, see T. Dan 2.4; T. Abr. (A) 8.10 (= J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.886) (BAGD 198; BAA 399). Perhaps these negative figurative uses in Judaism help set up Jesus' positive metaphors later? On fishing in Palestine, see Bishop 1951.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978: 636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

17 Plummer 1896: 393 notes correctly that Abraham's bosom is not a synonym for paradise, but that Abraham is there shows that Lazarus is among the righteous. The image indicates the story's Jewish flavor; so also Jeremias, TDNT 5:769 n. 37, citing T. Abr. (A) 20.13–14.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978: 636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

14 Jesus' tone differs from the "martyr" parallels in 2 Macc. 5–6 (where the intercession is a declaration of the sufferer's righteousness and faithfulness) and 7:14, 17, 19 (where the condemned promise God's vengeance on the executioner). On the other hand, some Jewish texts appeal to mercy for all, even sinners (Jon. 4:11; T. Ben. 4.2; Philo, Flaccus 2 §7; R. Brown 1994: 974), a merciful attitude that also appears in the church fathers (Ignatius, Ephesians 10.2–3; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.14).

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 ("spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming"); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279. In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

29 Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §§293–96, notes the mysterious opening of the temple doors at midnight on a Passover (but he doesn't give the year). T. Ben. 9.3 and T. Levi 10.3 refer to a rending of the temple curtain, but these references may be Christian interpolations; see M. De Jonge 1960: 222–26 (repr. pp. 233–37).

15 Δίκτυα is also plural, indicating that there is a crew on this boat. On the use of δίκτυον, see T. Dan 2.4; T. Abr. (A) 8.10 (= J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.886) (BAGD 198; BAA 399). Perhaps these negative figurative uses in Judaism help set up Jesus' positive metaphors later? On fishing in Palestine, see Bishop 1951.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi

18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses

10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

16 On ἁπλοῦς as "clear, pure, healthy," see BAGD 86 and BAA 171. When the eye is clear, it is healthy and takes in light. The eye is a figure for spiritual condition in Matt. 6:22; Prov. 4:18–19; 11:25 (ἁπλοῦς with a different sense); T. Iss. 3.4; 4.6; Bauernfeind, TDNT 1:386; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377; Harder, TDNT 6:556; SB 1:302, 431–32, 722, 833.

16 On ἁπλοῦς as "clear, pure, healthy," see BAGD 86 and BAA 171. When the eye is clear, it is healthy and takes in light. The eye is a figure for spiritual condition in Matt. 6:22; Prov. 4:18–19; 11:25 (ἁπλοῦς with a different sense); T. Iss. 3.4; 4.6; Bauernfeind, TDNT 1:386; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377; Harder, TDNT 6:556; SB 1:302, 431–32, 722, 833.

8 Normally meaning "to guard" (BAGD 868 §1f; BAA 1731 §1f), φυλάσσω here means to keep or obey the law; Lev. 20:22; 26:3; Ps. 119:5 [118:5 LXX]; Wis. 6:4; Sir. 21:11; 4 Macc. 5:29; T. Judah 26.1; T. Iss. 5.1; Luke 11:28.

8 Berger 1984: 337 §7, who also notes a parallel to T. Job 27.3–5. There is one distinction here: Job never talks with his adversary, so the parallel is not exact.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978:

636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978:
636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978:
636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

5 On ὄρθρος (dawn), see BAGD 580; BAA 1176; elsewhere in the NT at John 8:2 and Acts 5:21; cf. Gospel of Peter 12.50 (= Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.225); T. Jos. 8.1; 1 Enoch 100.2. On βαθύς (deep), see BAGD 130 §2; BAA 263 §2; elsewhere in the NT at John 4:11; Acts 20:9; Rev. 2:24.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as "legendary." He suggests a cure by "auto-suggestion," a rationalistic description that rejects the account's portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of "grace" as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

19 Thackeray 1912–13 discusses an idiom ("surrender unconditionally") possibly found in the greetings in Judg. 18:15; 1 Sam. 10:4; 17:22; 25:5; 30:21; T. Judah 9.7. But this force is less clearly documented; see Nolland 1993a: 764.

16 Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:26; Num. 36:13; Deut. 4:40; 10:13; 27:10; 2 Kings 17:13. In Judaism: 1 Macc. 2:21; T. Levi 14.4; T. Judah 13.1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:220; Klostermann 1929: 6; Plummer 1896: 9 (who notes that the terms are synonymous in this usage).

7 Tiede 1988: 233; Ernst 1977: 398; Fitzmyer 1985: 970; Lev. 19:18. Manson 1949: 271 notes the similar OT perspective: Job 31:24–25; Ps. 49; Eccles. 2:1–11. Note also T. Judah 18–19; Sir. 11:18–19; 1 Enoch 97.8–10; Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 9:5; 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14; B. Scott 1989: 131–32.

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

8 Normally meaning “to guard” (BAGD 868 §1f; BAA 1731 §1f), φυλάσσω here means to keep or obey the law; Lev. 20:22; 26:3; Ps. 119:5

[118:5 LXX]; Wis. 6:4; Sir. 21:11; 4 Macc. 5:29; T. Judah 26.1; T. Iss. 5.1; Luke 11:28.

10 On mourners, see m. Meg. 4.3; Danby 1933: 206 nn. 9–10. M. Ketub. 4.4 argues that a minimum of two flutes and one wailing woman should be present; also Ṣemaḥot 12.5 (= Zlotnick 1966: 81). T. Judah 26.3 protests against too much extravagance in the funeral procession for Judah.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n. 66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

29 Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §§293–96, notes the mysterious opening of the temple doors at midnight on a Passover (but he doesn't give the year). T. Ben. 9.3 and T. Levi 10.3 refer to a rending of the temple curtain, but these references may be Christian interpolations; see M. De Jonge 1960: 222–26 (repr. pp. 233–37).

16 Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:26; Num. 36:13; Deut. 4:40; 10:13; 27:10; 2 Kings 17:13. In Judaism: 1 Macc. 2:21; T. Levi 14.4; T. Judah 13.1; Schrenk, TDNT 2:220; Klostermann 1929: 6; Plummer 1896: 9 (who notes that the terms are synonymous in this usage).

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

40 Μέγας is used derisively of Simon Magus in Acts 8:10, but positively of Isaiah in Sir. 48:22; R. Brown 1977: 273 n. 33. It is used of Mordecai (Esth. 10:3), who was not a prophet. Bovon 1989: 56 compares the remarks to the "great" priestly figures in T. Levi 17–18. "Greatness" comes for the first priest of Jubilee in being able to talk to God (17:2), while for the last priest, the eschatological priest, it involves anointing by the Spirit (18:7). It is clear that greatness has to do with being specially endowed to serve God.

13 This may also be the significance of the request in Luke 8:31 not to be sent into the abyss; Van Der Loos 1965: 387 n. 4. 1 Enoch 56.3; T. Moses 10.11–12; and T. Levi 18 reflect such an eschatological judgment (the T. Moses reference is disputed; see J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.932, 933 n. g).

44 Num. 21:6–9; Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; 1 Kings 12:11, 14 = 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Sir. 21:2; 39:30. Meanwhile, Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107) gives such power to Noah; Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231) attributes a power to judge to the "Omnipresent"; while T. Levi 18 gives such power to the messianic high priest. Miyoshi 1974: 102–5 has a full survey of the Jewish texts and regards Deut. 8:15 as key.

13 T. Levi 18 has a messianic flavor to it, but this is an Aaronic Messiah, a priestly Messiah; cf. 1QS 9.11.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

5 Bovon 1989: 179 n. 65. He notes Isa. 64:1 [63:19 MT]; T. Levi 18.6–7. One could add 3 Macc. 6:18; 2 Bar. 22.1; Traub, TDNT 5:530 n. 263. Also seeing the presence of apocalyptic elements is Witherington 1990: 149, who compares the text to Rev. 1 and defends the event's authenticity as a vision.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n. 66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

31 Danker 1988: 49; Leaney 1958: 24 (who suggests that this hymn originally was tied to Anna [2:38], but then the question is why move it and bring in John the Baptist). Levi is referred to as a priest-king, fulfilling the Maccabean model. Evil king-priests of the Most High appear in T. Moses 6.1.

7 1 Enoch 102.9–10 shows the Jewish contempt for the selfish rich. T. Moses 7.3 may apply to the Sadducees or Pharisees. Lachs 1987: 311–12 revives Manson's thesis and rejects the idea that this is a description of the Pharisees. On the Pharisees' relatively modesty means (not every lover of money succeeds in being rich), see Jeremias 1969: 259; Bammel, TDNT 6:901–2.

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

13 This may also be the significance of the request in Luke 8:31 not to be sent into the abyss; Van Der Loos 1965: 387 n. 4. 1 Enoch 56.3; T. Moses 10.11–12; and T. Levi 18 reflect such an eschatological judgment (the T. Moses reference is disputed; see J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.932, 933 n. g).

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

25 For other figurative uses, see Ps. 39:3 [39:4 MT]; 73:21; T. Naph. 7.4; K. Schmidt, TDNT 3:464. For literal uses of καίω, see Matt. 5:15; 13:40; Luke 12:35; John 5:35; 15:6; Heb. 12:18; Rev. 4:5; 8:8, 10; 19:20; 21:8.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

15 Isa. 33:15; Prov. 28:18; Jub. 7.26; Hauck and Schulz, TDNT 6:571. Marshall 1978: 52 notes that this description for spiritual integrity carried over into Judaism; T. Reub. 1.6; 4.1.

11 BAGD 759; BAA 1516; Creed 1930: 104; Gen. 50:26; T. Reub. 7.2; MM 581. A plank is in view because the man arises directly upon Jesus' call.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

44 Fitzmyer 1981: 388. A similar exhortation for the “straight walk” is found in T. Sim. 5.2, but in Luke, God supplies the way; Bovon 1989: 110 n. 89.

14 On unclean spirits in the NT, see Hauck, TDNT 3:428 n. 12; in Judaism, see Zech. 13:2; T. Ben. 5.2; Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 12.20; T. Sim. 4.9; 6.6.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

30 Battle imagery with evil angels in the OT includes Isa. 24:22–23; in Judaism, T. Sim. 6.6 and T. Zeb. 9.8. Plummer 1896: 303; Danker 1988: 233; and Schürmann 1994: 243 see an allusion to Isa. 49:25–26. The battle imagery is similar, but the application to spiritual forces does not fit Isaiah’s language in 49:26a, which clearly pictures humans. At best, Isaiah shows the principle involved. Such a move with imagery, however, is not surprising; see Luke 1:67–79 and Bock 1993. The point in the language for Luke is how Jesus, as God's representative, is God's victorious warrior.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

38 Satan's access to heaven is assumed in Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7. Fitzmyer 1985: 862 and Nolland 1993a: 563 are against the Isaianic allusion, but Luke's language suggests that passage. As an allusion it does not identify Isaiah's referent, since Isaiah probably refers to an earthly king who arrogantly takes on the role of a god and is cast down by God. In later Jewish thinking, the king correctly becomes typological of what Satan also does. The phrase overlapping with Isa. 14:12 is ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ (from heaven). For Jewish handling of Isa. 14, see Miyoshi 1974: 100; see especially T. Sol. 20.16–17, which pictures demons falling like lightning to earth.

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

3 Marshall 1978: 86; Berger 1984: 243. Bovon 1989: 99 notes that the expressions here have similarities to the Testaments of the Twelve

Patriarchs: compassion (Luke 1:78; T. Zeb. 7.2–3; 8.2) and to visit (Luke 1:68, 78; T. Levi 4.4; T. Judah 23.5; T. Asher 7.3).

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

30 Battle imagery with evil angels in the OT includes Isa. 24:22–23; in Judaism, T. Sim. 6.6 and T. Zeb. 9.8. Plummer 1896: 303; Danker 1988: 233; and Schürmann 1994: 243 see an allusion to Isa. 49:25–26. The battle imagery is similar, but the application to spiritual forces does not fit Isaiah's language in 49:26a, which clearly pictures humans. At best, Isaiah shows the principle involved. Such a move with imagery, however, is not surprising; see Luke 1:67–79 and Bock 1993. The point in the language for Luke is how Jesus, as God's representative, is God's victorious warrior.

5 Herod the Great was said to have suffered from dropsy; Josephus, Antiquities 17.6.5 §§168–70. In the apocryphal Acts of Paul 4, Paul heals a man of this condition; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 2.247.

1 Aland 1985: §78. Extrabiblical parallels are the Gospel of Thomas 54, 68–69 and the Acts of Paul 5–6 (Bovon 1989: 295). Thomas's order is poor, persecuted, and hungry.we

31 Creed 1930: 63 cites Acts of Peter 32 and Lucian, Lover of Lies 13, while Fitzmyer 1981: 511 notes Josephus's description of Theudas in Antiquities 20.5.1 §§97–98.

23 Church tradition holds that Peter was crucified upside down (Acts of Peter 37–38 [Schneemelcher 1991–92: 2.315]), though this probably had not happened at the time of Luke's writing.

2 Plummer 1896: 233 cites the Acts of Pilate (= Gospel of Nicodemus) 1.7 as the first text to name her Bernice (= Latin Veronica); Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.511. This apocryphal work is available in a fifth-century edition, though its roots may reach back to the second century.

11 Filling in details of this story became popular in some circles. In the Old Latin, these two bandits are variously named Ioathas and Maggatras (Luke 23:32), Zoathan and Chammatha (Mark 15:27), or Zoathan and Camma (Matt. 27:38) (Plummer 1896: 530), while the Acts of Pilate 9 records their names as Dysmas and Gestas (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512). Still other traditions speak of Jesus falling, meeting Mary, and speaking with a women named Veronica (called Bernice in Acts of Pilate 8), who testified before Pilate because Jesus had healed her issue of blood (cf. Luke 8:43–48). See also the Arabic Infancy Gospel 23 (R. Brown 1994: 969; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.460).

11 Filling in details of this story became popular in some circles. In the Old Latin, these two bandits are variously named Ioathas and Maggatras (Luke 23:32), Zoathan and Chammatha (Mark 15:27), or Zoathan and Camma (Matt. 27:38) (Plummer 1896: 530), while the Acts of Pilate 9 records their names as Dysmas and Gestas (Schneemelcher 1991–92:

1.512). Still other traditions speak of Jesus falling, meeting Mary, and speaking with a women named Veronica (called Bernice in Acts of Pilate 8), who testified before Pilate because Jesus had healed her issue of blood (cf. Luke 8:43–48). See also the Arabic Infancy Gospel 23 (R. Brown 1994: 969; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.460).

21 In some church tradition, the confessing criminal's name is given as Dismas or Dysmas; Acts of Pilate 10.2 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512); Fitzmyer 1985: 1509. See n. 11.

13 Bovon 1989: 141 n. 22 notes that Simeon is a teacher or rabbi in the Acts of Pilate 16.2, 6.

13 Bovon 1989: 141 n. 22 notes that Simeon is a teacher or rabbi in the Acts of Pilate 16.2, 6.

11 Filling in details of this story became popular in some circles. In the Old Latin, these two bandits are variously named Ioathas and Maggatras (Luke 23:32), Zoathan and Chammatha (Mark 15:27), or Zoathan and Camma (Matt. 27:38) (Plummer 1896: 530), while the Acts of Pilate 9 records their names as Dysmas and Gestas (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.512). Still other traditions speak of Jesus falling, meeting Mary, and speaking with a women named Veronica (called Bernice in Acts of Pilate 8), who testified before Pilate because Jesus had healed her issue of blood (cf. Luke 8:43–48). See also the Arabic Infancy Gospel 23 (R. Brown 1994: 969; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.460).

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

8 In the Gospel of Peter (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.223, 224), ἐπιφώσκω (to break, shine forth) indicates the approach of Sabbath (2.5) or the dawn of day (9.34–35); BAGD 304; BAA 617; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 28:1; Marshall 1978: 881. Lohse, TDNT 7:20 n. 159, sees an allusion to the dawning of the evening star, a view that Plummer 1896: 543 rejects.

4 The Gospel of Peter 9.35–10.42 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.224–25) gives details about the resurrection, an expansion that demonstrates the differences between canonical and noncanonical accounts and indicates what happened to the tradition in the postapostolic period; cf. also Barn. 15.9. The glorified body is not a mere return to the former earthly existence (i.e., like the resurrection of Lazarus), but represents a transcendent form of real existence (1 Cor. 15:35–49, esp. 15:42–44). On the resurrection as event, see Stein 1977 and Craig 1980.

5 On ὄρθρος (dawn), see BAGD 580; BAA 1176; elsewhere in the NT at John 8:2 and Acts 5:21; cf. Gospel of Peter 12.50 (= Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.225); T. Jos. 8.1; 1 Enoch 100.2. On βαθύς (deep), see BAGD 130 §2; BAA 263 §2; elsewhere in the NT at John 4:11; Acts 20:9; Rev. 2:24.

20 Matt. 19:30 = Mark 10:31 applies the phrase to the powerful and wealthy, while Matt. 20:16 deals with the taking of the kingdom from the vineyard keepers in order to give it to another, a point similar to Luke’s.

Similar conceptual references are found in Barn. 6.13 and the Gospel of Thomas 4.

5 A parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 5–6 has Jesus speak of all becoming manifest.

2 Luke 12:49 also has a parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 10, and Luke 12:51–53 in the Gospel of Thomas 16.

9 A similar image is found in sayings in the Gospel of Thomas 10, 16, 82. In Thomas 10 and 82 fire alludes to the kingdom's closeness and focuses on purification, a meaning that is also possible from the OT (Lev. 13:52; Num. 31:23); but that is too positive for the division imagery here.

2 In the parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 13, Thomas is a major figure in the discussion and the wording is very different.

6 Interestingly, parts of 10:8–9, which is like 9:3–5 conceptually, show up in the Gospel of Thomas 14.4—but even this is not enough to raise the sayings' credibility in the seminar's eyes.

2 Luke 12:49 also has a parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 10, and Luke 12:51–53 in the Gospel of Thomas 16.

9 A similar image is found in sayings in the Gospel of Thomas 10, 16, 82. In Thomas 10 and 82 fire alludes to the kingdom's closeness and focuses on purification, a meaning that is also possible from the OT (Lev. 13:52; Num. 31:23); but that is too positive for the division imagery here.

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

1 The Gospel of Thomas 22 expands on the theme here by including the Gnostic doctrine of the "primordial unit" (Fitzmyer 1985: 1192).

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

14 Note also the Gospel of Thomas 33. This repetition shows that Luke is not averse to repeating sayings and also suggests that he is aware that certain sayings were said by Jesus in different settings with slightly differing force. The possibility of the tradition having several such duplications cannot be excluded. Not every parallel is a genuine overlap, but might be what has been called "alibi analogies," where the saying looks like a parallel, but really is not (see Reicke 1968: 26–30 for a detailed discussion).

61 See also the Gospel of Thomas 45a. On σαπρός as "rotten," "useless," or "of no value," see Bauernfeind, TDNT 7:97; Wiefel 1988: 139; Eph. 4:29.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

4 In the Gospel of Thomas 47b–c, the Synoptic order is reversed.

9 For a defense of the authenticity of Mark 2:18–20, and thus of its parallels, see V. Taylor 1966: 208–12 (who argues that the Marcan tradition has roots in an eyewitness and was told to reveal Jesus' mind about fasting); Cranfield 1959: 107–11; Marshall 1978: 223 (though he regards it as possible that Luke 5:36–39 may be a separate tradition). Bovon 1989: 256 also sees a distinct tradition, since Luke's saying has a parallel in the Gospel of Thomas 47, though in a different order (Luke: garment [5:36], then wine [5:37–39]; Thomas: the reverse). Teaching through word linkage was popular in Judaism. When done with the Scriptures, it was called gezerah shewah.

2 Luke 16:13 is exactly parallel to Matt. 6:24, except Luke has an additional word: οἰκέτης (servant). A different version is found in the Gospel of Thomas 47.

1 Aland 1985: §78. Extrabiblical parallels are the Gospel of Thomas 54, 68–69 and the Acts of Paul 5–6 (Bovon 1989: 295). Thomas's order is poor, persecuted, and hungry.we

1 Bovon 1989: 482 n. 4 sees evidence of oral tradition in Luke 9:25–26. The Gospel of Thomas 55 has a saying like Luke 9:23, while Thomas 67 is like Luke 9:25. 2 Tim. 2:12 is like Luke 9:26.

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

3 The Gospel of Thomas 63, 72 has parallel material, but §63 is not primary, as B. Scott 1989: 130–31 correctly argues. However, Scott wrongly asserts that the separation of the question and the parable in the Gospel of Thomas shows that Luke put these two elements together (with Scott, Funk and Hoover 1993: 338 argue that 12:15 was written by Luke, printing it in black type). The Gospel of Thomas lacks any warning, and so is only conceptually parallel. In addition, the general nature of the Gospel of Thomas is to work with only one short saying at a time.

7 The Coptic equivalent of Luke's ἴσως is used twice in the Gospel of Thomas 65 and may be evidence of Thomas's expansion on Luke.

1 Bovon 1989: 482 n. 4 sees evidence of oral tradition in Luke 9:25–26. The Gospel of Thomas 55 has a saying like Luke 9:23, while Thomas 67 is like Luke 9:25. 2 Tim. 2:12 is like Luke 9:26.

1 Aland 1985: §78. Extrabiblical parallels are the Gospel of Thomas 54, 68–69 and the Acts of Paul 5–6 (Bovon 1989: 295). Thomas's order is poor, persecuted, and hungry.we

3 The Gospel of Thomas 63, 72 has parallel material, but §63 is not primary, as B. Scott 1989: 130–31 correctly argues. However, Scott wrongly asserts that the separation of the question and the parable in the Gospel of Thomas shows that Luke put these two elements together (with Scott, Funk and Hoover 1993: 338 argue that 12:15 was written by Luke, printing it in black type). The Gospel of Thomas lacks any warning, and so is only conceptually parallel. In addition, the general nature of the Gospel of Thomas is to work with only one short saying at a time.

18 The passages match except for the reversal of two words, ἐργάτας ἐκβάλῃ (thrust out workers), in Matthew. Gospel of Thomas 73 also has an exact parallel; in Judaism, see m. ›Abot 2.15.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

9 A similar image is found in sayings in the Gospel of Thomas 10, 16, 82. In Thomas 10 and 82 fire alludes to the kingdom's closeness and focuses on purification, a meaning that is also possible from the OT (Lev. 13:52; Num. 31:23); but that is too positive for the division imagery here.

3 The Gospel of Thomas 86 also has a parallel, but with Gnostic overtones, since it speaks of laying one's head down and of rest; Fitzmyer 1981: 835.

3 So Kistemaker 1980: 45 speaks of the same occasion. On Q, see Grundmann 1963: 281; Egelkraut 1976: 108; Marshall 1978: 559–60; Wiefel 1988: 257; Fitzmyer 1985: 1015. The same linkage of parables occurs in Matthew and, as noted above, the wording in the leaven parable is very similar. The Gospel of Thomas 96–97 links the leaven parable to a different parable, the jar full of meal, which has no canonical parallel. A parable of the mustard seed is found in the Gospel of Thomas 20; Hunzinger, TDNT 7:290 n. 32.

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

1 Marshall 1978: 591 sees the presence of other sources. Wiefel 1988: 277 mentions Q, but also suggests that the passage may be independent (he sees 14:28–33 coming from special Lucan material). Grundmann 1963: 301 says that it is uncertain whether the material is from Q or from a source in Luke's special material. Ernst 1977: 447 is also uncertain. The double tradition in the Gospel of Thomas 55 (family and cross) and 101 (family) raises the possibility of the existence of multiple traditions in the church and, thus, whether they were said on multiple occasions. (The Gospel of Thomas 98 has a third picture of an assassin who practices by thrusting his sword into a wall.)

3 For the presence of these verses in Q are Schneider 1977a: 324–25 and Wiefel 1988: 282. Fitzmyer 1985: 1073 sees 15:4–6 in Q and 15:8–9 in L. Other parallels are found in the Gospel of Thomas 107 and the Gnostic Gospel of Truth 31.35–32.9.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 436. Bovon 1989: 154 prefers to speak only of a biographical interest, calling the account an anecdote. He compares it to the Infancy Story of Thomas 2, an account of a five-year-old Jesus fashioning twelve sparrows from clay. Though this account is much more fanciful than the Lucan pericope, its ending (19), stressing Jesus' wisdom, is similar to but less restrained than Luke's emphasis on wisdom (Schmahl 1974; see the exegesis of 2:46). In this case, the Infancy Gospel of Thomas is influenced by Luke (R. Brown 1977: 481).

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

18 Plummer 1896: 53. Bovon 1989: 120 n. 36 notes that expansions on the birth miracle occur in the second-century Protevangelium of James 4–10, 19–20.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as "legendary." He suggests a cure by "auto-suggestion," a rationalistic description that rejects the account's portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of “grace” as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

18 Plummer 1896: 53. Bovon 1989: 120 n. 36 notes that expansions on the birth miracle occur in the second-century Protevangelium of James 4–10, 19–20.

11 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, lists a few late Jewish and Christian texts that indicate a prophet’s discernment: Pseudo-Clement, Homilies 2.6.1; 3.11.2; 3.13.1–2 (where a true prophet is said to be the “one who knows all things”); Lev. Rab. 21.8 on 16:3 (where Rabbi Akiva “sees … in the Holy Spirit” that one of his pupils has received a message from home telling him to marry).

11 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, lists a few late Jewish and Christian texts that indicate a prophet’s discernment: Pseudo-Clement, Homilies 2.6.1; 3.11.2; 3.13.1–2 (where a true prophet is said to be the “one who knows all things”); Lev. Rab. 21.8 on 16:3 (where Rabbi Akiva “sees … in the Holy Spirit” that one of his pupils has received a message from home telling him to marry).

11 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, lists a few late Jewish and Christian texts that indicate a prophet’s discernment: Pseudo-Clement, Homilies 2.6.1; 3.11.2; 3.13.1–2 (where a true prophet is said to be the “one who knows all things”); Lev. Rab. 21.8 on 16:3 (where Rabbi Akiva “sees … in the Holy Spirit" that one of his pupils has received a message from home telling him to marry).

21 Derrett 1970: 220–21; b. Šab. 13b; 17b; m. ʿ*Abod. Zar.* 2.3. Derrett overinterprets the imagery here when he makes allusions to the temple setting.

6 Daube 1956: 433 believes that the verse asks simply for a biblical exposition of how the scribe sees the issue; so also Derrett 1970: 224. Daube cites as support m. ʿ*Abod. Zar.* 2.5, where the question "how do you read (קרא)?" seeks a specific scriptural response (though in fact what is asked for in the mishnaic example is a defense of a certain vocalization of the text).

13 Stählin, TDNT 9:160, also n. 117, exaggerates the ancient debate: some ancients (Plato, Phaerdus 233d–34a) said to invite only family and friends, while m. ʾ*Abot* 1.5 said to leave the door wide open (but for reasons of exclusion noted above). B. Scott 1989: 164 calls Jesus' instruction the "law of no return."

26 Through tracing the saying's later tradition history, Harvey 1982b: 211 n. 8 argues that its original context is not certain, but the Matthean and Lucan settings are a natural starting point. There is good cultural precedent in the Essene and other communities for such hospitable reception for traveling religious messengers. Rabbis were forbidden to receive direct wages for their teaching, though such provision was allowed; m. ʾ*Abot* 1.13; 4.5; Daube 1956: 395–96.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369;

SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

18 The passages match except for the reversal of two words, ἐργάτας ἐκβάλῃ (thrust out workers), in Matthew. Gospel of Thomas 73 also has an exact parallel; in Judaism, see m. ›Abot 2.15.

27 In Exod. Rab. 2.2 on 3:1, David and Moses are faithful in tending sheep, so God lets them rule the people. Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 5.1–11 on Exod. 20:2 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.229–30] makes a comparison between overt and secret acts. See also m. ›Abot 3.7; Manson 1949: 293.

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ›Abot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

26 Through tracing the saying's later tradition history, Harvey 1982b: 211 n. 8 argues that its original context is not certain, but the Matthean and Lucan settings are a natural starting point. There is good cultural precedent in the Essene and other communities for such hospitable reception for traveling religious messengers. Rabbis were forbidden to receive direct wages for their teaching, though such provision was allowed; m. ›Abot 1.13; 4.5; Daube 1956: 395–96.

9 BAGD 536; BAA 1085; m. Nid. 5.6; m. Meg. 4.6; m. ›Abot 5.21; Luke 2:42 (a conceptual example of Jesus at twelve); Acts 26:4; 1 Tim. 4:2; also Gen. 48:15; Num. 22:30; Isa. 47:15; 54:6; Jer. 3:25; Josephus, Jewish War 4.1.5 §33. See the exegesis of Luke 2:42.

5 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; Ps. 34:8 [34:9 MT]; 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1; Nah. 1:7; m. ›Abot 6.3 (God and his teaching). Plummer 1896: 422 argues that a rabbi is never called good in Judaism, but this is wrong; see b. Ber. 5a; b. Ta‹an. 24b; Lachs 1987: 331 nn. 2–3.

17 For an example of the form of rabbinic teaching, see m. ›Abot 6.5–6; Klostermann 1929: 47.

14 Grundmann 1963: 333 and Luce 1933: 273, 292 are clear on the sycomore/sycamore distinction. Plummer 1896: 400–401 is uncertain about the difference and argues that the hyperbole is more natural for a sycomore tree. Manson 1949: 141 sees an original sycamore tree, appealing to an Aramaic mistranslation and to the use of the term in the LXX as a rendering of Hebrew שִׁקְמָה (šiqmâ) for the sycamore, not to mention rabbinic discussions like m. B. Bat. 2.11. Schneider 1977a: 347 agrees with Manson and cites SB 2:234 for rabbinic images. Nonetheless, many use sycamore when they mean sycomore (Fitzmyer 1985: 1143–44 is uncertain).

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been “abandoned” by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

9 M. B. Qam. 5.6 is not parallel, since that passage deals with legal damages, not the Sabbath; so correctly Creed 1930: 189. B. Šab. 128b gives both rulings: one that allows and one that forbids help (also m. Šab. 18.2). This was a debated point among Jews, even in the fifth century.

25 Plummer 1896: 505 and Luce 1933: 335 make this connection, while Fitzmyer 1985: 1426 says that there is no need to do so. Nolland 1993b: 1073 suggests 2:30 a.m. for the initial crowing and notes that the reference in m. B. Qam. 7.7 forbidding chickens in Jerusalem is probably a later idealization and thus not a historical challenge to this detail.

29 Michel, TDNT 8:102. In b. Sanh. 25a–b tax collectors appear with dice players and Sabbath breakers; m. Ned. 3.4 and m. B. Qam. 10.2 pair them with murderers and robbers; and m. Ṭohar. 7.6 says a tax collector who enters a house makes it unclean. One can see, in light of the historical setting, why the NT derogatory phrase toll collectors and sinners was so common.

6 Lev. 21:1–3 shows that even the priests had such obligations if a close relative was involved, but the high priest was exempt in all cases (Lev. 21:11). As acts of mercy or works of love, such action was considered to have priority over normally important religious activity; see also Mic. 6:8; Tob. 1:17–18; 2:3–9; 4:3–4; 6:15; 12:12–14; 14:11–13; m. Pe‹a 1.1; m. Ber. 3.1; b. Ber. 18a (some of these texts even prohibit study of the Torah during mourning!). Only Nazirites were excepted from this requirement (Num.

6:6–8). In the Mishnah, m. Ber. 3.1 reads, “He who is confronted by a dead relative is free from reciting the Shemaʿ, from the Eighteen Benedictions [Shemoneh Esreh, the prayer of Israel], and from all the commandments stated in Torah.”

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

4 On women and the synagogue, see Safrai 1976c: 919–20; m. Ber. 3.3. Midr. ha-Gadol on Deut. 29:10 [29:11 MT] pictures women and children receiving teaching by hearing the readings of the Targums. Safrai notes that these late rabbinic texts are confirmed by Acts 16:13 and 17:4. Schweizer 1984: 222 is thus wrong to suggest that the woman is outside the synagogue.

6 For a similar intimate linkage of Jesus and God, see Luke 10:16; John 17:3, 18. To receive an emissary is to receive the person who sends the emissary; m. Ber. 5.5 (“a man’s emissary is like the man himself”); Philem. 15–18; SB 1:590; Fitzmyer 1981: 817.

37 The “representative” concept is common, reflecting the Jewish institution of the שָׁלִיחַ (šālıâḥ, the sent one). M. Ber. 5.5 says, “The one sent by the man is as the man himself.”

16 On the reference to the vine, see Deut. 22:9; Isa. 32:12; m. Ber. 6.1; b. Ber. 35a. The wording parallels the cup blessing in the Passover meal;

Büchsel, TDNT 1:685. On abstinence, cf. Lev. 10:9; Num. 6:3; Ezek. 44:21; Leaney 1958: 268.

4 Jeremias 1963a: 126; Jeremias 1966: 48–49, esp. 48 n. 4; Sir. 31:12, 18 (speaks of sitting); m. Ber. 6.6 (notes two types of sitting). While most of the other texts cited by Jeremias are talmudic, he does note OT texts such as Gen. 27:19; Exod. 32:6; Judg. 19:6; 1 Sam. 20:5, 24–25; 1 Kings 13:20; and Prov. 23:1.

14 Fitzmyer 1981: 753–54; Ellis 1974: 137; m. Ber. 9.5 (a command with roots in Exod. 3:5); Schürmann 1969: 501 n. 20; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.4 §§124–27 (about the Essenes). On the contrast with the practice of Greek cynics and philosophers, see Schürmann 1969: 502 n. 24 and Bovon 1989: 458 n. 20, who compares the disciples' absence of possessions with the Levites and their being provided for through the tithe (Num. 18:21).

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are "common people." He sees Jesus' offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with "common people," see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus' effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God's grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

20 In fact, in many traditions "overshadowing" such a corpse rendered one unclean; E. Sanders 1990: 33–35. Pharisees were particularly sensitive to this issue (Num. 19:11–22; Lev. 21:1–3; m. Dem. 2.3), as were the Essenes at Qumran (CD 12.15–18). This was a common Jewish concept; Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.3 §§36–38.

10 On mourners, see m. Meg. 4.3; Danby 1933: 206 nn. 9–10. M. Ketub. 4.4 argues that a minimum of two flutes and one wailing woman should be present; also Ṣemaḥot 12.5 (= Zlotnick 1966: 81). T. Judah 26.3 protests against too much extravagance in the funeral procession for Judah.

10 SB 1:45–47; m. Ketub. 4.4–5; Jeremias 1969: 364–67; Safrai 1976a: 752–60. The mishnaic text is suggestive for Matt. 1, since the initial realization of her pregnancy might suggest that Mary should be punished (Deut. 22:23–26) or, more leniently, be betrothed, given that premarital intercourse could result in betrothal (Deut. 22:28–29). Cases of rape were handled differently (Deut. 22:25–27).

6 Plummer 1896: 210 suggests that she is a prostitute, citing Matt. 21:32 as support. Rengstorf, TDNT 1:327, says that this interpretation of the terminology fits rabbinic expression, but gives no specifics at this point; Rengstorf's article shows ἁμαρτωλός to refer to a wide variety of the ungodly, including the Sadducees (m. Ketub. 7.6).

8 Scott makes much of the issue that a mustard tree is a shrub and yet yields cedar tree–like qualities in the parable. This “twist” may add a miraculous note to the image, though Scott believes (based on m. Kil. 3.2) its resultant force is an allusion to uncleanness (reflected in the sowing of mustard seed in a garden). If this idea is present, it is subtle. Only Luke’s form, with its garden reference, could sustain the point. The point more likely addresses only the unusual nature of the growth, not ritual uncleanness, a theme that Jesus tended not to address in reference to the kingdom.

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been “abandoned” by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

12 Marshall 1978: 127; R. Brown 1977: 474; Jeremias 1969: 58–60; Josephus, Life 52 §269; m. Ma‘as. Š. 5.2.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

19 M. Meg. 4.3 indicates what happens if ten men are not present.

10 On mourners, see m. Meg. 4.3; Danby 1933: 206 nn. 9–10. M. Ketub. 4.4 argues that a minimum of two flutes and one wailing woman should be present; also Ṣemaḥot 12.5 (= Zlotnick 1966: 81). T. Judah 26.3 protests against too much extravagance in the funeral procession for Judah.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

9 BAGD 536; BAA 1085; m. Nid. 5.6; m. Meg. 4.6; m. ʾAbot 5.21; Luke 2:42 (a conceptual example of Jesus at twelve); Acts 26:4; 1 Tim. 4:2; also Gen. 48:15; Num. 22:30; Isa. 47:15; 54:6; Jer. 3:25; Josephus, Jewish War 4.1.5 §33. See the exegesis of Luke 2:42.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

29 Michel, TDNT 8:102. In b. Sanh. 25a–b tax collectors appear with dice players and Sabbath breakers; m. Ned. 3.4 and m. B. Qam. 10.2 pair them with murderers and robbers; and m. Ṭohar. 7.6 says a tax collector who enters a house makes it unclean. One can see, in light of the historical setting, why the NT derogatory phrase toll collectors and sinners was so common.

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

9 BAGD 536; BAA 1085; m. Nid. 5.6; m. Meg. 4.6; m. ›Abot 5.21; Luke 2:42 (a conceptual example of Jesus at twelve); Acts 26:4; 1 Tim. 4:2; also Gen. 48:15; Num. 22:30; Isa. 47:15; 54:6; Jer. 3:25; Josephus, Jewish War 4.1.5 §33. See the exegesis of Luke 2:42.

47 See the exegesis of 1:44. Could this reflect the ancient Jewish view of the fetus as an existing child? Exodus 21:22 fines a person for causing a miscarriage, though with a lesser penalty than if the mother is also slain. The life of the mother took precedence over a fetus until the moment of birth; m. ›Ohol. 7.6.

6 Lev. 21:1–3 shows that even the priests had such obligations if a close relative was involved, but the high priest was exempt in all cases (Lev. 21:11). As acts of mercy or works of love, such action was considered to have priority over normally important religious activity; see also Mic. 6:8; Tob. 1:17–18; 2:3–9; 4:3–4; 6:15; 12:12–14; 14:11–13; m. Pe‹a 1.1; m. Ber. 3.1; b. Ber. 18a (some of these texts even prohibit study of the Torah during mourning!). Only Nazirites were excepted from this requirement (Num. 6:6–8). In the Mishnah, m. Ber. 3.1 reads, "He who is confronted by a dead relative is free from reciting the Shema‹, from the Eighteen Benedictions [Shemoneh Esreh, the prayer of Israel], and from all the commandments stated in Torah."

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to "acts of mercy"; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, "My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures." The object of the last clause is not clear ("for heaven," "of benefits," "of souls," or "for myself in the world to come"), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

12 Some see a problem in the shepherd's leaving behind the ninety-nine, but this is probably a detail omitted in the abbreviated telling of the story. Ἔρημος is an open field, a heath, where the animals grazed; Manson 1949: 283; 1 Sam. 17:28. On the use of the numbers ninety-nine and one, see SB 1:784–85; m. Pe‹a 4.1–2; Fitzmyer 1985: 1076.

11 Jeremias 1963a: 147, who cites m. Pe‹a 8.7. One is tempted to say that this woman was baking for an army, since this amount could feed over one hundred people.

26 Schürer 1973–87: 2.300–301, esp. n. 30; Josephus, Antiquities 14.4.3 §65; m. Pesaḥ. 5.1.

3 Carson cites texts where πάσχα can mean Passover week: Josephus, Antiquities 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; Jewish War 2.1.3 §10; m. Pesaḥ. 9.5.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

12 Jub. 11.11, 24; m. Šab. 7.2; Linnemann 1966: 115–16; Kistemaker 1980: 17; Jeremias 1966–67; and Jeremias 1963a: 11–12. P. Payne 1978–79 discusses the debate about the Palestinian order of sowing and plowing.

10 Marshall 1978: 493–94 notes the custom to eat two meals daily: a mid-morning meal called ἄριστον (BAGD 106; BAA 214) and a mid-afternoon meal called δεῖπνον (BAGD 173; BAA 346; m. Šab. 16.2). On the Sabbath, three meals were served, but a Sabbath meal is not indicated here. John 21:12, 15 refers to an early meal with a verb related to ἄριστον, so it is clear that this is not an evening setting. Josephus, Life 54 §279, notes a Sabbath meal at the sixth hour, or midday.

9 M. B. Qam. 5.6 is not parallel, since that passage deals with legal damages, not the Sabbath; so correctly Creed 1930: 189. B. Šab. 128b gives both rulings: one that allows and one that forbids help (also m. Šab. 18.2). This was a debated point among Jews, even in the fifth century.

5 R. Brown 1977: 369; SB 4:23–40. M. Šab. 19.5 indicates that circumcision could take place between the eighth and twelfth days. So important was this act that rabbinic texts speculated why it had not been included among the Ten Commandments; Pesikta Rabbati 23.4 (= Braude 1968: 479).

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

3 On Pilate, see the exegesis of 3:1. Tacitus, Annals 15.44, mentions Pilate's eventual decision; Fitzmyer 1985: 1474. Kinman 1991 considers the setting to be the assize of the Roman governor; Pilate's presence fits this custom. R. Brown 1994: 363–72 has a detailed discussion of the issue of capital punishment, noting that Jews had no authority to execute, except perhaps those who entered prohibited sections of the temple or committed adultery (John 7:53–8:11; m. Sanh. 7.2). John 18:13 thus fits the legal situation of Jesus' time. On Pilate's career in current literature, see R. Brown 1994: 694–705.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

32 Gen. 19; Deut. 29:23 [29:22 MT]; Isa. 1:9 (cited in Rom. 9:29); 3:9; 13:19; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:48–50; Amos 4:11; and Zeph. 2:9 show that Sodom was a symbol of the worst possible judgment; the NT texts are 2 Pet. 2:6–7 and Jude 7. Conceptually this Lucan passage is like the Lam. 4 text. So severely were Sodom and Gomorrah viewed in Judaism that some thought they would not even be raised to face final judgment (m. Sanh. 10.3; t. Sanh. 13.8 [= Neusner 1977–86: 4.240]).

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

10 Jeremias, TDNT 5:714, notes that a false prophet ran the risk of being killed (m. Sanh. 11.1). Friedrich, TDNT 6:834–35, points to Matt. 23:37. See also Fischel 1946.

19 M. Šeb. 9.1 is important, since it says that rue is not tithed; the presence of this statement in the Mishnah may suggest dispute. The Lucan reference may be to wild rue, not all varieties of rue; Liefeld 1984: 957. The terms are ἡδύοσμον (mint) (BAGD 344; BAA 698; elsewhere only at Matt. 23:23), the hapax legomenon πήγανον (rue) (BAGD 655; BAA 1320), and λάχανον (herb) (BAGD 467; BAA 950; elsewhere only at Matt. 13:32 = Mark 4:32; Rom. 14:2).

23 The penalty was apparently never carried out in Jesus' time since Jews did not have the right to execute capital punishment under Roman rule; Creed 1930: 208. The idea of such punishment still remains, as Jub. 30.8–9 shows. The standard was to pursue holiness. Such an act of adultery rendered a woman defiled (Jub. 33.9; m. Sot\;a 2.6; 5.1). In fact, these Mishnah texts almost require divorce for the adulterous wife since she becomes unclean to the husband. Thus, adultery was seen as extremely serious in Judaism (on the Greco-Roman view of adultery tied to shame, see Nolland 1993a: 818).

2 M. Soṭa 3.4 shows that some rabbis were against any instruction for women, while others thought it advisable. Josephus expresses a negative attitude toward women when he argues that the law says they are inferior to men in all things (Against Apion 2.24 §201). The connection of this text to Josephus is debated, since he does occasionally praise women, such as Alexandra (Antiquities 13.16.6 §§430–31). However, that she is regarded as an exception shows Josephus's general attitude.

23 The penalty was apparently never carried out in Jesus' time since Jews did not have the right to execute capital punishment under Roman rule; Creed 1930: 208. The idea of such punishment still remains, as Jub. 30.8–9 shows. The standard was to pursue holiness. Such an act of adultery rendered a woman defiled (Jub. 33.9; m. Sot\;a 2.6; 5.1). In fact, these Mishnah texts almost require divorce for the adulterous wife since she becomes unclean to the husband. Thus, adultery was seen as extremely serious in Judaism (on the Greco-Roman view of adultery tied to shame, see Nolland 1993a: 818).

7 Jewish excuses in other contexts include Deut. 20:5–7; 24:5; m. Soṭa 8.1–6. Marshall 1978: 588–89 correctly argues that Luke's concern about excessive attachment to possessions or family is present. Unfortunately, material concerns are dominant.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6; 1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

17 On the role of purity in Judaism as a stage on the way to holiness, see Neusner and Chilton 1991; *m. Soṭa*9.15. On the Pharisees' concern for purity, see Witherington 1990: 56–59, who speaks in particular of the ḥăbērîm, the overly strict Pharisees.

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

15 In ancient Judaism, Ps. 118 was seen as messianic; SB 1:849–50, 876; m. Suk. 3.9; Midr. Ps. 118.19–20 on 118:21–22 (= Braude 1959: 2.243–44); Jeremias 1966: 256–57.

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

57 M. Tamid 7.2; also 5.4–6.3; Creed 1930: 12; Fitzmyer 1981: 328. See the exegesis of 1:22 for details.

57 M. Tamid 7.2; also 5.4–6.3; Creed 1930: 12; Fitzmyer 1981: 328. See the exegesis of 1:22 for details.

58 M. Tamid 7.2, though a later text, probably reflects a first-century practice of several priests sharing in the offering itself, as well as individually helping to prepare for it. Although the Mishnah was written ca. A.D.. 170, this tradition is likely to reflect long-standing practice since it deals with temple liturgy—practice that was suspended with the fall of Jerusalem and its temple in A.D.. 70.

29 Michel, TDNT 8:102. In b. Sanh. 25a–b tax collectors appear with dice players and Sabbath breakers; m. Ned. 3.4 and m. B. Qam. 10.2 pair them with murderers and robbers; and m. Ṭohar. 7.6 says a tax collector who enters a house makes it unclean. One can see, in light of the historical setting, why the NT derogatory phrase toll collectors and sinners was so common.

24 Schürer 1973–87: 2.287 n. 74; m. Yoma› 2.2–4; m. Tamid 1.2; 3.1; 5.2; Safrai 1976d: 887–90; Hanse, TDNT 4:1.

12 The issue for some Jews was to avoid “fly-impurity,” contact with a dead swarming thing from water, which if present, made the hands unclean. Just to be sure, the cup’s outside and inside was washed; E. Sanders 1990: 29–42; t. Ber. 5.26 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.31). On Jewish cup tradition, see Maccoby 1982.

11 Washings took place before and after the meal. According to later tradition in the Talmud, only the washing after the meal was commanded by the Torah, the other was commanded by the rabbis; b. Ḥul. 105a. What is unclear is whether such rules applied to all meals or just to Sabbath and festival meals (y. Ber. 12a [8.2–3] [= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.284–91]); the real issue here is meals on the eve of Sabbath or at festival. E. Sanders 1990: 31 argues that there is no evidence of washing before every meal. Evidently the Pharisees' concern for contracting impurity from a dead swarming thing in liquid (Lev. 11:31–38) caused them to expand the biblical injunctions. But such a danger was not limited to the Sabbath or festal meals. As such, it is likely that such care was present at every meal. Booth 1986: 119–50, 194–203 cites t. Dem. 2.11–12 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.84) as key evidence.

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are "common people." He sees Jesus' offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with "common people," see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus' effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God's grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

8 In t. Menaḥ. 13.22 (= Neusner 1977–86: 5.162), the leadership's love of money and hatred of one another is why the temple came to be destroyed; also SB 1:937; 2:222; 4:336–39; Jeremias 1969: 49, 114. Luce 1933: 264 objects to this description, but fails to interact with the ancient sources. C. A. Evans 1990: 245 is right that a story about the afterlife would hardly be a meaningful rebuke to the Sadducees.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Peʿa 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to "acts of mercy"; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, "My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures." The object of the last clause is not clear ("for heaven," "of benefits," "of souls," or "for myself in the world to come"), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

8 Tob. 2:14; 4:7–11; 12:9; 14:8–11; Sir. 3:30; 29:12; 2 Enoch 50.5; Ps. Sol. 9.5; m. Pe‹a 1.1; t. Pe>a 4.17–21 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.45, 72–75); SB 1:430; Grundmann 1963: 262–63; Talbert 1982: 142; Wiefel 1988: 241; Matt. 19:21 = Mark 10:21 = Luke 18:22; 12:21. On the custom of alms, see BAGD 249–50; BAA 504. Ἐλεημοσύνη refers literally to "acts of mercy"; Bultmann, TDNT 2:486; Dan. 4:27 [4:24 MT]. Interestingly, the refrain of t. Pe>a 4.18 is, "My ancestors stored up treasures of money, but I have stored up treasures." The object of the last clause is not clear ("for heaven," "of benefits," "of souls," or "for myself in the world to come"), but the point about the value of alms is clear.

7 Earlier Jewish texts on the theme include Jdt. 16:17; 1 Enoch 10.13; 18.11–16; 27.1–3; 90.26; Jub. 9.15; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36; Fitzmyer 1985: 959–60. Apparently a debate in Judaism discussed whether hell involved eternal torment or limited suffering with extinction, a view called "annihilationism" today. The Tosepta text noted argues that there are three groups of people: one destined for eternal life, another destined for shame and everlasting contempt, and a third group that visits Gehenna but is healed as through a refiner's fire, citing Zech. 13:9 and 1 Sam. 2:6. As the portion of t. Sanh. 3 quoted above shows, some Jews believed that Gehenna burns the body and the soul perishes after twelve months of judgment.

32 Gen. 19; Deut. 29:23 [29:22 MT]; Isa. 1:9 (cited in Rom. 9:29); 3:9; 13:19; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:48–50; Amos 4:11; and Zeph. 2:9 show that Sodom was a symbol of the worst possible judgment; the NT texts are 2 Pet. 2:6–7 and Jude 7. Conceptually this Lucan passage is like the Lam. 4 text. So severely were Sodom and Gomorrah viewed in Judaism that some thought they would not even be raised to face final judgment (m. Sanh. 10.3; t. Sanh. 13.8 [= Neusner 1977–86: 4.240]).

10 1 Cor. 11:5–6; Godet 1875: 1.358. Jeremias 1963a: 126 n. 57 notes that such action in later times could bring grounds for divorce; see *t. Soṭa*5.9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 3.168) and y. Giṭ. 50d (9.11) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 25.254).

5 The talmudic text is late, but that the woman in Luke is allowed in makes it likely that this was the custom. B. Ber. 31b relates a parable of a poor man who requests food from a king, suggesting a form of limited access, since he was able to force his way in to see the king (SB 4:615; Jülicher 1899: 2.291). However, it must be admitted that the parallel is distant. B. Ber. 41b relates an exchange between rabbis during a meal, but it is not clear that anyone else is there to hear it. Also relevant is b. B. Bat. 8a, where during a famine a rabbi opens his home to students, but not to the unlearned. When chastised by another rabbi for this, the rabbi relents and allows all to enter. The dilemma of the rabbinic passage is whether one should be generous. Thus, the extrabiblical evidence for an open meal is not great. Still, within the text the evidence suggests such an occasion.

26 For the various degrees of breaking Sabbath, see m. Šab. 7.1; b. B. Bat. 60b; Manson 1949: 119; Schweizer 1984: 214; Talbert 1982: 144; Fitzmyer 1985: 992; SB 2:192.

13 Later Judaism used a similar saying about an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to refer to an impossible dream or an illogical argument; Lachs 1987: 331–32; b. Ber. 55b; b. B. Mes\;. 38b; SB 1:828; Marshall 1978: 687.

14 Ἀγρός refers to fields associated with a farm where animals graze; BAGD 14 §3; BAA 24 §3. Βόσκω means “to tend animals”; Matt. 8:33 = Mark 5:14 = Luke 8:34; BAGD 145; BAA 289. SB 1:492–93 cites several Jewish texts that condemn or forbid Jews to raise swine, including b. B. Qam. 82b: “Cursed is the man who raises swine, and cursed is the man who teaches his son Greek philosophy.”

25 In later Judaism, the picture of salt was applied nationally in a passage that is seen as a polemic against Jesus’ teaching: b. Bek. 8b, which argues that salt cannot lose its saltiness.

5 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; Ps. 34:8 [34:9 MT]; 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1; Nah. 1:7; m. ʾ*Abot* 6.3 (God and his teaching). Plummer 1896: 422 argues that a rabbi is never called good in Judaism, but this is wrong; see b. Ber. 5a; b. Taʿan. 24b; Lachs 1987: 331 nn. 2–3.

7 B. Ber. 28b matches the Pharisee’s prayer, while b. Ber. 17a is more gracious in valuing the contribution that each person makes when attention is directed to God. In b. Suk. 45b a man states that if only one hundred are to be saved, he and his son will be among them; but if only two are saved, they will be he and his son; Ellis 1974: 214. In y. Ber. 7d (4.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.168) a rabbi give thanks that he is in the synagogue and not in the theater or circus.

6 Lev. 21:1–3 shows that even the priests had such obligations if a close relative was involved, but the high priest was exempt in all cases (Lev. 21:11). As acts of mercy or works of love, such action was considered to have priority over normally important religious activity; see also Mic. 6:8; Tob. 1:17–18; 2:3–9; 4:3–4; 6:15; 12:12–14; 14:11–13; m. Peʿa 1.1; m. Ber.

3.1; b. Ber. 18a (some of these texts even prohibit study of the Torah during mourning!). Only Nazirites were excepted from this requirement (Num. 6:6–8). In the Mishnah, m. Ber. 3.1 reads, “He who is confronted by a dead relative is free from reciting the Shemaʿ, from the Eighteen Benedictions [Shemoneh Esreh, the prayer of Israel], and from all the commandments stated in Torah.”

7 B. Ber. 28b matches the Pharisee’s prayer, while b. Ber. 17a is more gracious in valuing the contribution that each person makes when attention is directed to God. In b. Suk. 45b a man states that if only one hundred are to be saved, he and his son will be among them; but if only two are saved, they will be he and his son; Ellis 1974: 214. In y. Ber. 7d (4.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.168) a rabbi give thanks that he is in the synagogue and not in the theater or circus.

6 On being worthy of a place in the future world, see b. Ber. 28b, 51a; y. Ber. 11d (7.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.276).

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs’s citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

5 The talmudic text is late, but that the woman in Luke is allowed in makes it likely that this was the custom. B. Ber. 31b relates a parable of a poor man who requests food from a king, suggesting a form of limited access, since he was able to force his way in to see the king (SB 4:615; Jülicher 1899: 2.291). However, it must be admitted that the parallel is distant. B. Ber. 41b relates an exchange between rabbis during a meal, but it is not clear that anyone else is there to hear it. Also relevant is b. B. Bat. 8a, where during a famine a rabbi opens his home to students, but not to the unlearned. When chastised by another rabbi for this, the rabbi relents and allows all to enter. The dilemma of the rabbinic passage is whether one should be generous. Thus, the extrabiblical evidence for an open meal is not great. Still, within the text the evidence suggests such an occasion.

16 On the reference to the vine, see Deut. 22:9; Isa. 32:12; m. Ber. 6.1; b. Ber. 35a. The wording parallels the cup blessing in the Passover meal; Büchsel, TDNT 1:685. On abstinence, cf. Lev. 10:9; Num. 6:3; Ezek. 44:21; Leaney 1958: 268.

5 The talmudic text is late, but that the woman in Luke is allowed in makes it likely that this was the custom. B. Ber. 31b relates a parable of a poor man who requests food from a king, suggesting a form of limited access, since he was able to force his way in to see the king (SB 4:615; Jülicher 1899: 2.291). However, it must be admitted that the parallel is distant. B. Ber. 41b relates an exchange between rabbis during a meal, but it is not clear that anyone else is there to hear it. Also relevant is b. B. Bat. 8a, where during a famine a rabbi opens his home to students, but not to the unlearned. When chastised by another rabbi for this, the rabbi relents and allows all to enter. The dilemma of the rabbinic passage is whether one should be generous. Thus, the extrabiblical evidence for an open meal is not great. Still, within the text the evidence suggests such an occasion.

6 On being worthy of a place in the future world, see b. Ber. 28b, 51a; y. Ber. 11d (7.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.276).

13 Later Judaism used a similar saying about an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to refer to an impossible dream or an illogical argument; Lachs 1987: 331–32; b. Ber. 55b; b. B. Mes\;. 38b; SB 1:828; Marshall 1978: 687.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

4 In b. Giṭ. 52a, Satan says of Rabbi Meir's work of reconciling two men, "Woe is me; he has driven me out of my house"; cited in SB 1:217. See b. Ḥul. 105b on the "demon of the poor."

9 On fasting (νηστεύω), see the exegesis of Luke 5:33; BAGD 538; BAA 1089–90; Lev. 16:29–31 and Num. 29:7 (the Day of Atonement); 2 Sam. 12:21–22 (for mourning); 1 Kings 21:27 (for penance); Neh. 1:4 (for prayer). B. Giṭ.. 56a and b. Taʿan. 12a give the Jewish custom. The cultural assumption is that the pious fast more often than once a year.

16 Because it is a first-century work, 4 Macc. 13:17 provides key evidence: a martyr for the law is welcomed and praised by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. See also b. Qid. 72a; b. Giṭ. 57b; Pesikta Rabbati 43.4 (= Braude 1968: 2.761); R. Meyer, TDNT 3:825–26. In Pesikta Rabbati, if a person bows down to an idol, he or she will have a place at Esau's bosom, not Abraham's.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

16 Keck 1970–71. B. Ḥag. 15a, a talmudic reference of later origin, makes this connection. More recently, Allison 1992 argues vigorously for a connection to Gen. 1:2. The Messianic Vision fragment from Qumran (see photograph and R. H. Eisenman's translation in Biblical Archaeology Review 17.6 [Nov.–Dec. 1991]: 65) might contain an allusion to Messiah and Gen. 1:2. If so, the objection to the lateness of the other Jewish parallels is removed. The image would suggest a "new" beginning in God's work, though I disagree with Allison that the remark is only symbolic, as if one must choose between history and symbol.

11 Washings took place before and after the meal. According to later tradition in the Talmud, only the washing after the meal was commanded by the Torah, the other was commanded by the rabbis; b. Ḥul. 105a. What is unclear is whether such rules applied to all meals or just to Sabbath and festival meals (y. Ber. 12a [8.2–3] [= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.284–91]); the real issue here is meals on the eve of Sabbath or at festival. E. Sanders 1990: 31 argues that there is no evidence of washing before every meal. Evidently the Pharisees' concern for contracting impurity from a dead swarming thing in liquid (Lev. 11:31–38) caused them to expand the biblical injunctions. But such a danger was not limited to the Sabbath or festal meals. As such, it is likely that such care was present at every meal. Booth 1986: 119–50, 194–203 cites t. Dem. 2.11–12 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.84) as key evidence.

4 In b. Giṭ. 52a, Satan says of Rabbi Meir's work of reconciling two men, "Woe is me; he has driven me out of my house"; cited in SB 1:217. See b. Ḥul. 105b on the "demon of the poor."

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

3 There is no need to regard the story as a creation based on 2 Kings 4:27, but so Bultmann 1963: 32, who also cites a rabbinic story from the later b. Ketub. 63a, where disciples try to dissuade Akiva from seeing his mother. This approach is rightly rejected by Fitzmyer 1985: 1192 and Marshall 1978: 681–82.

27 Fitzmyer 1981: 609. Josephus, Antiquities 6.12.1 §§242–43, does not mention the bread in describing the account. SB 1:618–19 notes the rabbinic accounts; b. Menaḥ. 95b cites a remark by Rabbi Shim<on (ca. A.D.. 150).

34 Forgiveness expressed as a passive (as in James 5:15: "he will be forgiven") shows that God does the forgiving. B. Ned. 41a reads, "No one gets up from his sick-bed until all his sins are forgiven."

11 B. Ned. 41a. The presupposition here is that God shows his healing mercy only to the righteous. A sinner can count on nothing from God. Neither will God work through one who makes false claims. For this talmudic text, see the exegesis of 5:21.

4 B. Nid. 70b raises another issue about resurrection: Will resurrected people need to be ritually cleansed after resurrection since they had contact with death and the grave?

16 Because it is a first-century work, 4 Macc. 13:17 provides key evidence: a martyr for the law is welcomed and praised by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. See also b. Qid. 72a; b. Giṭ. 57b; Pesikta Rabbati 43.4 (= Braude 1968: 2.761); R. Meyer, TDNT 3:825–26. In Pesikta Rabbati, if a person bows down to an idol, he or she will have a place at Esau's bosom, not Abraham's.

21 Derrett 1970: 220–21; b. Šab. 13b; 17b; m. ʿAbod. Zar. 2.3. Derrett overinterprets the imagery here when he makes allusions to the temple setting.

21 Derrett 1970: 220–21; b. Šab. 13b; 17b; m. ʿAbod. Zar. 2.3. Derrett overinterprets the imagery here when he makes allusions to the temple setting.

5 Though not accepting this view, Schweizer 1984: 272 notes a rabbinic tradition that if two Sabbaths were perfectly observed the kingdom would come, citing Isa. 56:4–7; b. Šab. 118b; SB 1:600 §B. Against this view is the late tractate Derek ʾereṣ Rabbah 11.13 (= A. Cohen 1965: 2.565), which cites Rabbi Jose as saying, "Whoever calculates the end has no portion in the future world." This fits the later rabbis' tendency to discourage apocalyptic speculation.

7 The concept of reception pictures the open welcome to be given to others. On δέξηται (he receives), see Marshall 1978: 396; Grundmann, TDNT 2:51–52. The term refers to friendly reception or hospitality, which was seen as sacred in the ancient world and in Judaism. B. Šab. 127a says, "Hospitality to travelers is greater than the greeting of the Shekinah." Though hyperbolic, the saying shows the importance of hospitality. Josephus, Jewish War 7.4.1 §63, refers to how Vespasian's reception brought joy and satisfaction.

9 M. B. Qam. 5.6 is not parallel, since that passage deals with legal damages, not the Sabbath; so correctly Creed 1930: 189. B. Šab. 128b gives both rulings: one that allows and one that forbids help (also m. Šab. 18.2). This was a debated point among Jews, even in the fifth century.

29 Michel, TDNT 8:102. In b. Sanh. 25a–b tax collectors appear with dice players and Sabbath breakers; m. Ned. 3.4 and m. B. Qam. 10.2 pair them with murderers and robbers; and m. Ṭohar. 7.6 says a tax collector who enters a house makes it unclean. One can see, in light of the historical setting, why the NT derogatory phrase toll collectors and sinners was so common.

39 B. Sanh. 38b contains Rabbi Jose's famous condemnation of Rabbi Akiva for profaning the Shekinah by arguing that David could sit beside God on a heavenly throne.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab.

13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

7 B. Ber. 28b matches the Pharisee's prayer, while b. Ber. 17a is more gracious in valuing the contribution that each person makes when attention is directed to God. In b. Suk. 45b a man states that if only one hundred are to be saved, he and his son will be among them; but if only two are saved, they will be he and his son; Ellis 1974: 214. In y. Ber. 7d (4.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.168) a rabbi give thanks that he is in the synagogue and not in the theater or circus.

6 Ernst 1977: 448 is hesitant about this connection. Manson 1949: 131 shows the idiom by citing a late Jewish text, b. Taʿan. 7b, where it is said of certain rabbis, "If they hated their beauty, they would be more learned." The opposite attitude where other things are loved more is found in Luke 14:20 and 18:20–24.

9 On fasting (νηστεύω), see the exegesis of Luke 5:33; BAGD 538; BAA 1089–90; Lev. 16:29–31 and Num. 29:7 (the Day of Atonement); 2 Sam. 12:21–22 (for mourning); 1 Kings 21:27 (for penance); Neh. 1:4 (for prayer). B. Giṭ.. 56a and b. Taʿan. 12a give the Jewish custom. The cultural assumption is that the pious fast more often than once a year.

13 See 1 Kings 14:15. B. Taʿan. 20a stresses tenderness, not resoluteness: "Man should strive to be tender like a reed, not hard like the cedar," a text that commends a characteristic the exact opposite of John's; Manson 1949: 68.

5 1 Chron. 16:34; 2 Chron. 5:13; Ps. 34:8 [34:9 MT]; 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136:1; Nah. 1:7; m. ʾ*Abot* 6.3 (God and his teaching). Plummer 1896: 422 argues that a rabbi is never called good in Judaism, but this is wrong; see b. Ber. 5a; b. Taʿan. 24b; Lachs 1987: 331 nn. 2–3.

3 Luce 1933: 186 is wrong to say that the remark is more literal in Mark than in Luke, for the contexts are identical. Fitzmyer 1981: 788 notes the OT parallels to saving one's ψυχή: Gen. 19:17; 1 Sam. 19:11; and Jer. 31:6 LXX [48:6 MT]; Schürmann 1969: 543 n. 111. Jewish parallels are found in b. Tamid 32a ("What shall a man do to live? They replied: Let him mortify himself. What should a man do to kill himself? They replied: Let him keep himself alive [i.e., indulge in luxuries]") and b. Ber. 63b ("whoever abases himself for the words of the Torah will in the end be exalted"); SB 1:587–88. Bovon 1989: 482 speaks of the OT picture of the two ways (Deut. 30:15–18) and compares Luke's emphasis to the structure of Luke 6:47–49. Note how the Jewish emphasis on the law is replaced with an emphasis on Christ in the NT.

7 B. Ber. 28b matches the Pharisee's prayer, while b. Ber. 17a is more gracious in valuing the contribution that each person makes when attention is directed to God. In b. Suk. 45b a man states that if only one hundred are to be saved, he and his son will be among them; but if only two are saved, they will be he and his son; Ellis 1974: 214. In y. Ber. 7d (4.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.168) a rabbi give thanks that he is in the synagogue and not in the theater or circus.

6 On being worthy of a place in the future world, see b. Ber. 28b, 51a; y. Ber. 11d (7.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.276).

11 Washings took place before and after the meal. According to later tradition in the Talmud, only the washing after the meal was commanded by the Torah, the other was commanded by the rabbis; b. Ḥul. 105a. What is unclear is whether such rules applied to all meals or just to Sabbath and festival meals (y. Ber. 12a [8.2–3] [= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 1.284–91]); the real issue here is meals on the eve of Sabbath or at festival. E. Sanders 1990: 31 argues that there is no evidence of washing before every meal. Evidently the Pharisees' concern for contracting impurity from a dead swarming thing in liquid (Lev. 11:31–38) caused them to expand the biblical injunctions. But such a danger was not limited to the Sabbath or festal meals. As such, it is likely that such care was present at every meal. Booth 1986: 119–50, 194–203 cites t. Dem. 2.11–12 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.84) as key evidence.

10 1 Cor. 11:5–6; Godet 1875: 1.358. Jeremias 1963a: 126 n. 57 notes that such action in later times could bring grounds for divorce; see *t. Soṭa*5.9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 3.168) and y. Giṭ. 50d (9.11) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 25.254).

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

4 Y. Ḥag. 77d (2.2) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 20.57–58); Geldenhuys 1951: 154; SB 2:155; Godet 1875: 1.202. Another reference is y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.182). If this view were correct, then the Protevangelium of James 1–5 is wrong to name Mary's father as Joachim. But the origin and value of this NT apocryphal tradition are uncertain.

12 Jeremias 1963a: 177 calls them "the ipso facto beggars in the East." On this theme, see the later Jewish story of Bar Maʿjan; y. Sanh. 23c (6.6) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 31.181–82).

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab.

13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ʾ*Abot* 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

7 While Frg. Tg. Exod. 12:42 provides an example of the rabbis' eschatological reading of this event, appeal is made to Aquila's translation of this verse, which uses παρατήρησις (see also Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Pisḥa 14 on Exod. 12:42 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 1.115–16]). The variety in the ancient tradition shows the age of this association.

7 Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 retreats slightly from his earlier position, which argued that such attestation is entirely missing from the extrabiblical texts. But he argues that the evidence from Tg. Neof. 1 on Gen. 4:14 and Cairo Targum B is too late to be relevant.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ʾ*Abot* 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

13 Liefeld 1984: 883–84. E. Sanders 1985: 174–211 connects the idea of sinners to those who charge interest against the command of Lev. 25:36–38 and argues that, whoever they are, not all of them are “common people.” He sees Jesus’ offense as offering sinners hope of God without requiring the legal restitution that Judaism asked for from sinners. If later Jewish materials are a help in understanding the Jewish attitude, the view was that such sinners would have used their money or their bodies for immoral purposes: Tg. Onq. Gen. 13:13; t. Dem. 3.4–9 (= Neusner 1977–86: 1.88–89); SB 1:498–99. On a difference of opinion within Judaism about association with “common people,” see m. Dem. 2.2–3. This last text shows that clean food was also a key concern. Not every religious Jew would have been disturbed by Jesus’ effort, but some clearly would have been. Table fellowship, along with clean and unclean food, would be a key concern to some of Jewish background. Appeal may have come from a broad reading of Lev. 10:10. As the rest of the passage makes clear, Jesus does not ignore the need to turn to God (Luke 5:32), but he emphasizes God’s grace and its availability to help as the first step, rather than as a later result.

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ʾ*Abot* 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

27 J. A. Sanders 1975: 83–88, where he mentions six passages, three of which have an eschatological focus: Lam. Rab. 3.9 on 3:49–50, Yalqut ha-Makhiri on Isa. 61:1, and Tg. Ps.-J. Num. 25:12, where Isa. 61 is linked with Mal. 3:1.

20 Jeremias 1963a: 130 calls the phrase an Aramaism and cites Tg. 2 Sam. 3:21 (cf. Acts 5:17; 9:6, 18). Fitzmyer 1985: 1089 calls it a Septuagintalism and cites Gen. 22:3, 19; 24:10; 43:8; Tob. 8:10 [8:9 NRSV]. All that this really shows is that the idiom is cross-cultural.

6 Dalman 1909: 143–44 notes this suggestion by A. Meyer, who appeals to Aramaic נְטִיר (nēṭir̂, observation) and בִּנְטִיר (binṭir̂, secretly) in Tg. Job 4:12.

5 Y. Soṭa 20c (5.4) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 27.153); Creed 1930: 21; SB 2:101. The idea of singing babies does represent a major expansion of this motif, not paralleled in the OT or NT. On βρέφος as fetus, see Oepke, TDNT 5:637; BAA 293–94; Luke 1:44; Sir. 19:11. In later Judaism, Tg. Ps. 68:27 calls on the fetus in the womb to praise God, while Odes Sol. 28.2 speaks of a child leaping in the womb; Bovon 1989: 85 n. 35.

10 The stone as a messianic image in Judaism draws esp. on Isa. 28:16 and Dan. 2:44–45; but see also Gen. 28:17–19; Zech. 4:8–10; 3:8–9; Tg. Ps. 118:24 (printed in Walton 1657: 3.274; see Ellis 1974: 233). For Tg. Isa. 28:16 and other Jewish parallels, see Jeremias, TDNT 4:272–73. Tg. Isa. 28:16(CALTGO) reads: “Behold I set in Zion a king, a mighty king, mighty and terrible, whom I will uphold and strengthen; the prophet says: ‘And the righteous in whom is confidence shall not tremble when affliction comes.’”

14 O. Betz, TDNT 9:288–90, 298. Some cite Tg. Song 2:12; SB 1:123–24, but Sjöberg, TDNT 6:382, notes that the Spirit never appears in the form of a dove in rabbinic writings.

15 T. Job 47.11; 52.2, 5; T. Abr. (A) 20.11–12. For the reprobate, a satanic escort to hell is also a possibility; T. Asher 6.4–6 (Marshall 1978: 636 notes that this text is textually disputed); SB 2:223–27; Tg. Song 4.12.

10 The stone as a messianic image in Judaism draws esp. on Isa. 28:16 and Dan. 2:44–45; but see also Gen. 28:17–19; Zech. 4:8–10; 3:8–9; Tg. Ps. 118:24 (printed in Walton 1657: 3.274; see Ellis 1974: 233). For Tg. Isa.

28:16 and other Jewish parallels, see Jeremias, TDNT 4:272–73. Tg. Isa. 28:16(CALTGO) reads: “Behold I set in Zion a king, a mighty king, mighty and terrible, whom I will uphold and strengthen; the prophet says: ‘And the righteous in whom is confidence shall not tremble when affliction comes.’”

15 Fitzmyer 1981: 468. Jeremias, TDNT 4:269–71, notes that in later Judaism the imagery describes the creation of the nation, as Tg. Isa. 51:1 shows. Bovon 1989: 172 does not consider the allusion likely, since he sees Luke alluding to the Gentiles here. Bovon also distinguishes between a stone (here) and a rock (the OT image). Bovon is right that Luke has an implication here about Gentiles, but that still need not deny the background of the OT, especially since the Greek wording is translated out of the original setting. The OT allusion is possible, though not certain. This remark is also against a view of “covenantal nomism”; see Allison 1987. Placement into blessing is not a matter of election through mere biology.

22 For details, see Bock 1987: 319 n. 68; J. A. Sanders 1975: 80–81. The idea of anointing, the establishment of justice, and the picture of restoration are shared in Isa. 42:1, 3–4; 49:4, 7; 61:1–2. Tg. Isa. 61:1 clearly reads the text this way: “The spirit of prophecy from before Lord Elohim is upon me.” But it is wrong to read the OT passage as only about Isaiah, as C. F. Evans 1990: 269 does. Salvation in Isaiah is depicted in terms of God’s exodus pattern and is too comprehensive to refer only to Isaiah. Judaism was right to read the text ultimately in terms of the eschaton. This is another typologically fulfilled text like Luke 3:4–6; see the discussion of typology there.

28 Tg. Lam. 2:20 reads, “Zechariah son of Iddo, the high priest”; Gundry 1967: 86 n. 1. The Chronicles priest likely functioned as a prophet in 2 Chron. 24:19–22, but his priestly function was paramount in his identification as the son of a great priest. It should be noted that within three verses we have two potential points of contact with Tg. Lam. 2:20, though this second contact is not certain (see the exegesis of 11:49).

16 In Gen. 4:10 Abel’s spilled blood cries out, and esp. in Hab. 2:11 Jerusalem’s stones cry out against Israel’s injustice and sin. Marshall 1978: 716 notes the possibility that creation will speak out against the sin of the Pharisees (Jeremias, TDNT 4:270), an option that is less satisfying contextually than the standard OT use of the image; so correctly SB 2:253, which notes the use of this figure in Judaism: Tg. Hab. 2:11; Midr. Ps. 73.4 on 73:10 (= Braude 1959: 2.4).

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a “heavenly,” redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels.

The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels.

The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

11 Later Jewish tradition shows a connection between the eschaton and healing: Pesikta Rabbati 15.22 (= Braude 1968: 336–37), where Isa. 35:5–6 is used; Aggadat Bereshit 69.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); possibly 1QH 18.14–15.

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

27 In Exod. Rab. 2.2 on 3:1, David and Moses are faithful in tending sheep, so God lets them rule the people. Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 5.1–11 on Exod. 20:2 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.229–30] makes a comparison between overt and secret acts. See also m. ›Abot 3.7; Manson 1949: 293.

11 Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 9 on Exod. 20:21 [= 20:18 in NJPSV] (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.274): “All who are lofty of heart are called an abomination, as it is said, ‘Everyone who is lofty of heart is an abomination to the Lord.’” Manson 1949: 295–96 notes that the OT describes idolatry in similar terms (e.g., 1 Kings 11:5). Because it is the ultimate worship of the creature over the Creator, pride may be the most common form of idolatry.

7 While Frg. Tg. Exod. 12:42 provides an example of the rabbis’ eschatological reading of this event, appeal is made to Aquila’s translation of this verse, which uses παρατήρησις (see also Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Pisḥa 14 on Exod. 12:42 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 1.115–16]). The variety in the ancient tradition shows the age of this association.

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a “heavenly,” redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

4 On women and the synagogue, see Safrai 1976c: 919–20; m. Ber. 3.3. Midr. ha-Gadol on Deut. 29:10 [29:11 MT] pictures women and children receiving teaching by hearing the readings of the Targums. Safrai notes that these late rabbinic texts are confirmed by Acts 16:13 and 17:4. Schweizer 1984: 222 is thus wrong to suggest that the woman is outside the synagogue.

16 In Gen. 4:10 Abel's spilled blood cries out, and esp. in Hab. 2:11 Jerusalem's stones cry out against Israel's injustice and sin. Marshall 1978: 716 notes the possibility that creation will speak out against the sin of the Pharisees (Jeremias, TDNT 4:270), an option that is less satisfying contextually than the standard OT use of the image; so correctly SB 2:253, which notes the use of this figure in Judaism: Tg. Hab. 2:11; Midr. Ps. 73.4 on 73:10 (= Braude 1959: 2.4).

42 In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Satan is commonly viewed as the defeated enemy or associated with serpents: T. Dan 6.3–4; T. Moses 10.1; and possibly Sir. 25:15, 24. Grundmann, TDNT 3:400, adds T. Levi 18.12; T. Zeb. 9.8; and Jub. 10.8. In later Judaism, see Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107). Seesemann, TDNT 5:943, sees a figure of speech referring to protection, but it is better to speak of a miracle picturing victory and protection, since miraculous authority is present. Other Jewish texts on Satan include T. Asher 7.3 and T. Dan 5.10–11.

44 Num. 21:6–9; Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; 1 Kings 12:11, 14 = 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Sir. 21:2; 39:30. Meanwhile, Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107) gives such power to Noah; Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231) attributes a power to judge to the "Omnipresent"; while T. Levi 18 gives such power to the messianic high priest. Miyoshi 1974: 102–5 has a full survey of the Jewish texts and regards Deut. 8:15 as key.

15 In ancient Judaism, Ps. 118 was seen as messianic; SB 1:849–50, 876; m. Suk. 3.9; Midr. Ps. 118.19–20 on 118:21–22 (= Braude 1959: 2.243–44); Jeremias 1966: 256–57.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

20 Leaney 1958: 80; SB 2:71. Gen. Rab. 38.14 on 11:29–30 attributes the remark to Rabbi Levi, an ascription that dates the remark to ca. A.D. 300.

10 For the contrast between judgment of the righteous and the sinner, see Prov. 11:31; 1 Pet. 4:17–18; SB 2:263; Gen. Rab. 65.22 on 27:27.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

14 Marshall 1978: 600–601 has details and notes the views. Bultmann 1963: 171 and Linnemann 1966: 67–70 opt for Matthean originality, while Jeremias 1963a: 40 and Ellis 1974: 197 are convinced that Luke has the original form. Marshall is undecided, as is Nolland 1993a: 769. All of this assumes that only one tradition of the story originally existed, which may not be true, as Marshall notes. Bultmann 1963: 202 also notes a similar parable in the later Gen. Rab. 86.4 on 39:2, where one of twelve cows is lost; also SB 1:785.

27 In Exod. Rab. 2.2 on 3:1, David and Moses are faithful in tending sheep, so God lets them rule the people. Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 5.1–11 on Exod. 20:2 [= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.229–30] makes a comparison between overt and secret acts. See also m. ›Abot 3.7; Manson 1949: 293.

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27; and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

53 On the idea of total authority in παραδίδωμι (to give over), see Büchsel, TDNT 2:171; Matt. 11:27; 28:18 (δίδωμι); 1 Cor. 15:24; Exod. Rab. 15.30 on 12:2. Stauffer, TDNT 2:348, calls this passage the "cry of jubilation."

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression “Palestinian.”

3 Similar settings are found in Luke 10:25–30; 12:13–15; 15:1–3. The idea is to share in eternal reward or eternal life. On the eschatological banquet in Judaism, see Exod. Rab. 25.7 on 16:4; 2 Bar. 29.8; 1 Enoch 25.5; Behm, TDNT 2:691.

18 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 6:25–28 (where Enoch and Elijah [referred to as “men who were taken up”] are tied to the eschaton); Sir. 48:10 (where it is said that Elijah’s return is predicted in the “prophecies of doom”); Exod. Rab. 32.9 on 23:20–21 (where Exod. 23:20 and Mal. 3:1 appear in the same discussion).

9 For πορφύρα, see BAGD 694; BAA 1391; 1 Macc. 8:14; 10:62; Esth. 8:15; Mark 15:17, 20. For βύσσος, see BAGD 148; BAA 296–97; Ezek. 16:10; 27:7. The terms occur together in Rev. 18:12; Prov. 31:22; 1QapGen 20.31. On the use of purple to indicate power and regal dress, the late Exod. Rab. 38.8 on 29:1 is illustrative.

3 Manson 1949: 278 notes a passage in Theophrastus, Characters 21.2, where the sign of a proud man is that he seeks the seat beside the host. Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (commenting on Prov. 25:7) has a similar exhortation for people to stay two or three seats down; see also Josephus, Antiquities 15.2.4 §21.

9 Prov. 25:6–7 (NRSV) says, “Do not put yourself forward in the king’s presence / or stand in the place of the great; / for it is better to be told, ‘Come up here,’ / than to be put lower in the presence of a noble.” For Jewish parallels, see Sir. 3:17–20; 4:8; 12:11; 29:5; Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1

(fifth century); ›Abot de Rabbi Nathan A.25 (= Goldin 1955: 110); Bultmann 1963: 104; Fitzmyer 1985: 1047; SB 1:916.

10 Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 attributes a noneschatological statement to Hillel: “My humiliation is my exaltation and my exaltation is my humiliation.” For more on this midrash, see n. 3 above.

6 Lev. Rab. 15.2 on 13:2 comments on Job 28:25: “Man is evenly balanced, half of him is water, and the other half is blood. When he is deserving, the water does not exceed the blood, nor does the blood exceed the water; but when he sins, it sometimes happens that the water gains over the blood and then he becomes a sufferer from dropsy; at other times the blood gains over the water and he then becomes leprous”; Van Der Loos 1965: 505.

11 Friedrich, TDNT 6:844 n. 400, lists a few late Jewish and Christian texts that indicate a prophet’s discernment: Pseudo-Clement, Homilies 2.6.1; 3.11.2; 3.13.1–2 (where a true prophet is said to be the “one who knows all things”); Lev. Rab. 21.8 on 16:3 (where Rabbi Akiva “sees … in the Holy Spirit” that one of his pupils has received a message from home telling him to marry).

14 On βρυγμός (gnashing), see BAGD 147–48; BAA 294–95; Rengstorf, TDNT 1:642; Prov. 19:12; Sir. 51:3; Plummer 1896: 347. On κλαυθμός (weeping), see BAGD 433; BAA 882; Rengstorf, TDNT 3:726; Job 30:31; Jer. 3:21. The verb βρύχω (to gnash) is used as an expression of anger in Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16 [34:16 LXX]; 37:12 [36:12 LXX]; 112:10 [111:10 LXX]; Marshall 1978: 567. On darkness and judgment in Judaism, see 1 Enoch 103.7–8; 108.5–14; Ps. Sol. 14.9; 15.10; Lev. Rab. 27.1 on 22:27;

and Exod. Rab. 14.2 on 10:22. Leviticus Rabbah cites Ps. 35:6; Gen. 1:2; Isa. 29:15; and Eccles. 6:4 in describing Gehenna's darkness. Exodus Rabbah cites Job 10:22; Ezek. 31:15; Isa. 29:15; and Gen. 1:2. The partial overlap of OT texts is interesting.

7 On the mustard seed as proverbial for a small quantity in Judaism, see m. Nid. 5.2; b. Ber. 31a; Manson 1949: 123; Michel, TDNT 3:810–12, esp. 810 n. 1; SB 1:669. Citing Lev. Rab. 31 on 24:2, Lachs 1987: 225 notes that the mustard seed is proverbial in Judaism for the smallest size, a stark contrast to the strong image of the cedar. Lachs's citation of Lev. Rab. 31, which deals with the production of olive oil, is not clear. Is the mustard seed implied in the oil excluded as worthy in Lev. Rab. 31.10?

15 Κεράτιον (little horn) was eaten only by the poorest humans; BAGD 429; BAA 873; a NT hapax legomenon. Marshall 1978: 609 cites a saying from Lev. Rab. 35.6 on 26:3: "When the Israelites are reduced to carob pods, then they repent." This food was nicknamed "John the Baptist's bread," on the erroneous idea that John ate carobs. John's carob was sweet, while this carob was bitter; Nolland 1993a: 783; Bailey 1976: 171–73.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps.

Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

12 In late Judaism, Moses and Elijah are linked eschatologically in Deut. Rab. 3.17 on 10:1; SB 1:756; Schürmann 1969: 557.

11 On lifting the eyes in prayer, see Mark 6:41; 7:34; John 11:41; 17:1; Ps. 123:1; 1 Esdr. 4:58 (in 1 Enoch 13.5 evil angels are too ashamed to look up); Jeremias, TDNT 1:185–86; Michaelis, TDNT 5:377 n. 11. Lifting the hands is a symbol of supplication in the NT; 1 Tim. 2:8. Στῆθος (breast) stands for the person; BAGD 767 and BAA 1532 (“the seat of the inner life”); elsewhere in the NT only at Luke 23:48; John 13:25; 21:20; Rev. 15:6. Jeremias 1963a: 141 at n. 46 says that in Judaism the heart is seen as the seat of sin, but cites as evidence only the late Eccles. Rab. 7.2.5 on 7:2.

24 SB 2:212 narrates a similar Jewish parable from a later period in Song Rab. 1.1.9 on 1:1, where the subject is seeking wisdom like silver, a reference to the Torah.

15 Gen. 26:12 speaks of Isaac’s hundredfold yield, but that text has no clear connection to Luke. It is debated whether this is a normal or exaggerated yield; Nolland 1989: 371–72 opts for a high yield. On the ancient custom of measuring a yield twice, see Song Rab. 7.3.3 on 7:3. Normal yields ranged from sevenfold to tenfold (Schürmann 1969: 454 n. 78), so that a hundredfold return is exceptional.

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

17 Lam. Rab. 1.34 on 1:7 reads, “When a son abroad goes barefoot [through poverty], then he remembers the comfort of his father’s house.”

29 Some add an association between swaddling clothes and Messiah in Lam. Rab. 1.51 on 1:16, an approach discussed and rejected by Marshall 1978: 107.

27 J. A. Sanders 1975: 83–88, where he mentions six passages, three of which have an eschatological focus: Lam. Rab. 3.9 on 3:49–50, Yalqut ha-Makhiri on Isa. 61:1, and Tg. Ps.-J. Num. 25:12, where Isa. 61 is linked with Mal. 3:1.

16 On priestly uncleanness, see Lev. 21:1; on priests' being excused from helping sinners, see Sir. 12:4–6 and Midr. Sam. 5 §9 (31a). Nolland 1993a: 593 adds Num. 5:2; 19:2–13; Ezek. 44:25–27 to the list of texts on uncleanness, but rightly refuses to name these as a motive in the parable.

11 Later Jewish tradition shows a connection between the eschaton and healing: Pesikta Rabbati 15.22 (= Braude 1968: 336–37), where Isa. 35:5–6 is used; Aggadat Bereshit 69.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); possibly 1QH 18.14–15.

5 R. Brown 1977: 369; SB 4:23–40. M. Šab. 19.5 indicates that circumcision could take place between the eighth and twelfth days. So important was this act that rabbinic texts speculated why it had not been included among the Ten Commandments; Pesikta Rabbati 23.4 (= Braude 1968: 479).

15 SB 1:96–97; 2:154; Lam. Rab. 1.23 on 1:2; Leqaḥ Tob on Num. 24:17 (2.129b, 130a) (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 389–90); Pesikta Rabbati 29/30B.4 (= Braude 1968: 587–90). On the OT roots of the concept of renewal in the wilderness, see Ezek. 20:33–38; Hos. 2:14–23 [2:16–25 MT]; Nolland 1989: 143; Mauser 1963.

26 Pesikta Rabbati 36.2 (= Braude 1968: 680–83); Kirk 1972: 95–98; Wiefel 1988: 102. However, the Jewish text is late and it speaks only of his standing on the roof of the temple.

7 Gen. 49:25; Prov. 23:24–25; Fitzmyer 1985: 928; Grundmann 1963: 222 (who notes the contrast to Gospel of Thomas 79); Hauck, TDNT 4:369; SB 2:187–88; m. ›Abot 2.8; 2 Bar. 54.10; and later targumim on Gen. 49:25 (i.e., Ps.-J., Neof. 1, and Frg. Tg.). Manson 1949: 88 notes that Pesikta Rabbati 37.2 (= Braude 1968: 2.689) says this of Messiah's mother (cited as §149a by Manson according to an older numbering scheme; see SB 1:161).

16 Because it is a first-century work, 4 Macc. 13:17 provides key evidence: a martyr for the law is welcomed and praised by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. See also b. Qid. 72a; b. Giṭ. 57b; Pesikta Rabbati 43.4 (= Braude 1968: 2.761); R. Meyer, TDNT 3:825–26. In Pesikta Rabbati, if a person bows down to an idol, he or she will have a place at Esau's bosom, not Abraham's.

7 On Fitzmyer's view, see the opening paragraph of the sources and historicity section. Bovon 1989: 202 also argues that the account depicts the victory of faith in the face of opposition. In his view only two texts parallel this account's point about refusing miracles as signs: Dan. 3 and Sipra 227 on Lev. 22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231). But only the latter is really parallel in showing that one does not reveal signs to someone who is unworthy. On Jesus' resisting temptation or persevering in trial, see Luke 22:28; John 6:15, 26–34; 7:1–4; on his refusal to do signs, see Luke 22:39–46; Heb. 2:17–18; 4:15; 5:2. For the history of this text's exegesis, see Kö;ppen 1961.

44 Num. 21:6–9; Ps. 58:4 [58:5 MT]; 140:3 [140:4 MT]; 1 Kings 12:11, 14 = 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Sir. 21:2; 39:30. Meanwhile, Midr. Ps. 91.8 on 91:13 (= Braude 1959: 2.107) gives such power to Noah; Sipra 227 on Lev.

22:29–33 (= Neusner 1988b: 3.231) attributes a power to judge to the "Omnipresent"; while T. Levi 18 gives such power to the messianic high priest. Miyoshi 1974: 102–5 has a full survey of the Jewish texts and regards Deut. 8:15 as key.

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^a = 4QpsDan ar^a), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

27 J. A. Sanders 1975: 83–88, where he mentions six passages, three of which have an eschatological focus: Lam. Rab. 3.9 on 3:49–50, Yalqut ha-

Makhiri on Isa. 61:1, and Tg. Ps.-J. Num. 25:12, where Isa. 61 is linked with Mal. 3:1.

17 Marshall 1978: 555 cites the refusal in Syriac Ahiqar 8.35 and the small yield in ʾAbot de Rabbi Nathan A.16 (= Goldin 1955: 86).

9 Prov. 25:6–7 (NRSV) says, "Do not put yourself forward in the king's presence / or stand in the place of the great; / for it is better to be told, 'Come up here,' / than to be put lower in the presence of a noble." For Jewish parallels, see Sir. 3:17–20; 4:8; 12:11; 29:5; Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (fifth century); ʾAbot de Rabbi Nathan A.25 (= Goldin 1955: 110); Bultmann 1963: 104; Fitzmyer 1985: 1047; SB 1:916.

5 Though not accepting this view, Schweizer 1984: 272 notes a rabbinic tradition that if two Sabbaths were perfectly observed the kingdom would come, citing Isa. 56:4–7; b. Šab. 118b; SB 1:600 §B. Against this view is the late tractate Derek ʾereṣ Rabbah 11.13 (= A. Cohen 1965: 2.565), which cites Rabbi Jose as saying, "Whoever calculates the end has no portion in the future world." This fits the later rabbis' tendency to discourage apocalyptic speculation.

15 SB 1:635 cites Derekʾereṣ Zuṭṭa 5 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 251): "A house in which there is disunity will assuredly be destroyed at the last."

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

40 In Judaism, 1 Enoch 55.4; Jub. 23.29; T. Sim. 6.6; T. Judah 25.3; Sibylline Oracles 3.796–807; T. Moses 10.1–3. Leaney 1958: 179 notes that the specific picture of a fall from heaven (for the wicked angels, not Satan specifically) comes later in Judaism (e.g., the eighth-century Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 22 [= Friedlander 1916: 160]). In Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 6:4 (= Bowker 1969: 151), the angels that fell are named Shamhazi and Azael. In Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 14 [= Friedlander 1916: 99]), the angel Sammael is cast down from heaven for deceiving Eve. For Judaism, Sammael in all likelihood equals the devil (Wis. 2:24; Tg. Ps.-J. on Gen. 3:6 [= Bowker 1969: 121]).

15 SB 1:500–18; Jeremias, TDNT 4:1101–3; Bovon 1989: 260. Jeremias notes that nowhere in Judaism is Messiah the bridegroom. Stauffer, TDNT 1:654 n. 39, cites 2 Esdr. [4 Ezra] 2:15, 38; Deut. Rab. 3.12 on 10:1; Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 41 (= Friedlander 1916: 322); Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Baḥodesh 3 on Exod. 19:17 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.219), where God comes forth as a groom to meet Israel his bride. In Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Shirata 3 on Exod. 15:2 (= Lauterbach 1933–35: 2.26–27), Akiva cites several texts from the Song of Songs as applying to Israel as the bride of God, making it clear that this book was read as a marriage between Israel and God.

4 Pirqe de Rabbi Eliezer 48 (= Friedlander 1916: 378), an eighth-century text that is too late to be of real help; R. Brown 1977: 369. Gen. 21:3 may belong here in light of Gen. 21:4–5, but it is hard to be sure; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:82.

7 Ṣemaḥot 8–11 (= Zlotnick 1966: 57–80; see Lerner 1987: 389–91), an extratalmudic tractate, deals with the deceased. M. Ber. 3.1–2 and b. Ketub. 17a say that if a procession is small, one is to interrupt the study of Torah to participate, but if the group is large enough, one should continue studying; SB 1:1047–48. Though the Ketubot tractate is late, it reveals the importance to Jews of community involvement in mourning.

10 On mourners, see m. Meg. 4.3; Danby 1933: 206 nn. 9–10. M. Ketub. 4.4 argues that a minimum of two flutes and one wailing woman should be present; also Ṣemaḥot 12.5 (= Zlotnick 1966: 81). T. Judah 26.3 protests against too much extravagance in the funeral procession for Judah.

16 Translation from Jeremias 1971a: 198. See also Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 3 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456, 460). However, Jesus' prayer is more like Jewish "short" prayers than this long Jewish liturgical prayer; C. A. Evans 1990: 182. As such, the prayer's form and function come as no surprise in a Jewish context.

13 In Sir. 23:1, 4; 51:10 πατήρ often occurs alongside κύριος (Lord) or δεσπότης (master) (Schrenk, TDNT 5:979 n. 209, 981, 984–85). Elsewhere in Judaism at Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] nos. 4–6 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.456–57, 460); Wis. 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:3, 8. In the OT at Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; 64:8 [64:7 MT]; Jer. 3:4; Ps. 68:5 [68:6 MT]; 89:26 [89:27 MT] (of God's relationship to the king, as also 2 Sam. 7:14); Mal. 1:6; 2:10; 1 Chron. 29:10. As a NT term of intimacy, see Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6; Mark 14:36.

35 On gathering as a figure of bringing together God's people, see Michel, TDNT 7:419–20, who also interprets the imagery as picturing a harvest. Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 10 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.457) reads: "Blessed are you, Lord, who gathers the dispersed of your people Israel."

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

18 Ellis 1974: 183 notes that the image from Micah was applied to messianic times in Judaism: 1 Enoch 99.5; 100.1–2; Jub. 23.19; 2 Bar. 70.6; 1Q14 [= 1QpMic.] 20–21. M. Soṭa 9.9 applied the remark to the martyrdom of a rabbi, so the text was used as a common description of opposition. Division is also found in Luke 14:26; 17:34–35; Mark 10:29–30.

19 Ellis 1974: 189 notes that Qumran had a similar banquet expectation, but with a very different and exclusive audience, namely Messiah, the high priest, the priests, the chief of the tribes, and the congregation of Israel's righteous; 1Q28a [= 1QSa = Rule Annex] 2.11–22. Fitzmyer 1985: 1026 and Marshall 1978: 568 add other Jewish references: 1 Enoch 62.14; 2 Enoch 42.5; 2 Bar. 29.4; m. ʾAbot 3.17; SB 4:1148, 1154–59.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 141 overstates the parallelism with Pauline usage, as do Fitzmyer 1985: 1185 and Arndt 1956: 380. Linnemann 1966: 62–63, 144–46 n. 11; Ernst 1977: 497–98; and Marshall 1978: 680–81 are clearer. Cf. Ps. 51:19 [51:21 MT]; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 12:7; 1Q28b [= 1QSb] 4.22.

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

5 Luke 5:15; 8:2; 11:14; 13:12; Matt. 8:17. Demonic influence may be a better description than demonic possession, because it is not behavior but a diseased condition that is the point; Luke 4:33, 38–39; 2 Cor. 12:7. Weakness is produced by the evil spirit; 1QapGen 20.17, 21–29; Stählin, TDNT 1:493; Marshall 1978: 557. Fitzmyer 1985: 1012 calls the genitival ἀσθενείας (weakness) an Aramaism; see Creed 1930: 183. Nolland 1993a: 724 suggests that the number eighteen may be conventional (2 x 9 = “a long time”); Judg. 3:13–14; 10:8; 20:25, 44; 2 Sam. 8:13. This is possible, but not certain.

5 Luke 5:15; 8:2; 11:14; 13:12; Matt. 8:17. Demonic influence may be a better description than demonic possession, because it is not behavior but a diseased condition that is the point; Luke 4:33, 38–39; 2 Cor. 12:7. Weakness is produced by the evil spirit; 1QapGen 20.17, 21–29; Stählin, TDNT 1:493; Marshall 1978: 557. Fitzmyer 1985: 1012 calls the genitival ἀσθενείας (weakness) an Aramaism; see Creed 1930: 183. Nolland 1993a: 724 suggests that the number eighteen may be conventional (2 x 9 = “a long time”); Judg. 3:13–14; 10:8; 20:25, 44; 2 Sam. 8:13. This is possible, but not certain.

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (gā‹ar, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (gĕ‹ar, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT];

106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

18 Josephus ties the origin of Jewish exorcism to the days of Solomon; Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; 2.13.3 §286; Tob. 6:1–7; 8:1–3; 1QapGen 20.29; SB 4:533–35; Grundmann 1963: 238; Talbert 1982: 137.

9 For πορφύρα, see BAGD 694; BAA 1391; 1 Macc. 8:14; 10:62; Esth. 8:15; Mark 15:17, 20. For βύσσος, see BAGD 148; BAA 296–97; Ezek. 16:10; 27:7. The terms occur together in Rev. 18:12; Prov. 31:22; 1QapGen 20.31. On the use of purple to indicate power and regal dress, the late Exod. Rab. 38.8 on 29:1 is illustrative.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 995–96 notes that awareness of rejection by a religious leader is not unparalleled and cites 1QH 2.11–14, 32–33 as examples. Jesus was capable of anticipating his vindication in death; so correctly Bayer 1986: 77–85.

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 995–96 notes that awareness of rejection by a religious leader is not unparalleled and cites 1QH 2.11–14, 32–33 as examples. Jesus was capable of anticipating his vindication in death; so correctly Bayer 1986: 77–85.

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

5 Εὐχαριστέω (to thank) is common, but not in the first person. The verb is used six times by Luke, including Luke 17:16; Acts 27:35; 28:15; also 1QH 2.20, 31; 3.19, 37; 4.5; 2 Macc. 1:11. Luke 10:21 is similar in tone, but decidedly different in content.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

9 For fire as purging, Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 12 mentions Isa. 1:25; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3; 1QH 5.16.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

41 Bertram, TDNT 8:619 n. 48, cites 1QH 7.6–7 (where God's power as Most High and the Spirit are linked; see 1QH 6.33) and T. Levi 16.3 (where a man who brings renewal to the Law is said to work by "the power of the Most High"). Some think that T. Levi 16 has been reworked by a Christian editor to allude to Jesus; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.794 n. 16a. Grundmann, TDNT 2:300, 311 n. 91, notes the tie between power and the Spirit. Procksch, TDNT 1:101, speaks of a "supranatural origin."

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

6 The judging or separating function of the Holy Spirit is in view in 3:16. On πῦρ, see BAGD 730 §2; BAA 1461 §2, and the exegesis of 3:16. In the OT, fire is a common way to refer to judgment of both Israel and its enemies: Jer. 43:12; Ezek. 15:7; Hos. 8:14; Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5; Nah. 3:13; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3. It is also a major judgment image in Jewish apocalyptic literature: 1 Enoch 18.15; 102.1; 2 Bar. 37.1; 48.39; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13:10–11; Ps. Sol. 15.4–5; Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1QH 8.20; Wiefel 1988: 247; Lang, TDNT 6:936–37; Nolland 1993a: 708.

19 1QH 4.32–33; 11.9; Shemoneh Esreh [Eighteen Benedictions] no. 17 (= Schürer 1973–87: 2.458); Marshall 1978: 112; Fitzmyer 1981: 411–12; Jeremias 1929a; Jeremias, TDNT 1:364; Schrenk, TDNT 2:745–50; Fitzmyer 1958; Nolland 1989: 109.

12 BAGD 375; BAA 762; cf. Ps. 51:1, 3 [51:3, 5 MT]; 25:11; 34:6, 18 [34:7, 19 MT]; 78:38; 79:9; 2 Kings 5:18; 1QS 11.3–5, 10–12; 1QH 11.15–22. Ἱλάσκομαι appears in the NT only here and in Heb. 2:17.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

11 Later Jewish tradition shows a connection between the eschaton and healing: Pesikta Rabbati 15.22 (= Braude 1968: 336–37), where Isa. 35:5–6 is used; Aggadat Bereshit 69.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); possibly 1QH 18.14–15.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22;

Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the "secrets of God" (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to "new" revelation and other times to "clarifying" revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to "clarifying" revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22;

Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

23 On God's power, see Josh. 4:24; 1 Chron. 12:23; Wis. 7:25; 2 Macc. 3:24, 38; 9:8; 1QM 1.11, 14; 4.4, 12; 6.2, 6; 10.5; Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22; Fitzmyer 1985: 1467; Grundmann, TDNT 4:540.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

47 Exod. 32:32; Ps. 69:28 [69:29 MT]; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 7:10; 12:1; Mal. 3:16–17; 1 Enoch 47.3; 104.1; 108.7; Jub. 5.13–14; 23.32; 30.19–23; 1QM 12.2; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27; Ellis 1974: 157; Fitzmyer 1985: 863–64; SB 2:173–76; Schrenk, TDNT 1:619–20; Traub, TDNT 5:532 n. 295. Manson 1949: 258–59 lists the various "books" mentioned in the Bible and Judaism: (1) book of life, (2) book of human deeds, (3) book of the earthly destiny of people, and (4) book of the divine plan. Only the first two are in the Bible.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 921 notes other names used for Satan in Judaism: Belial (2 Cor. 6:15; 1QS 1.18, 24), Mast\;emah (1QS 3.23; 1QM 13.4; Jub. 10.8), and Asmodeus (Tob. 3:8, 17).

18 Ellis 1974: 100. The Hebrew term is גָּעַר (*gā*ʿ*ar*, to shout at, exorcise), the Aramaic גְּעַר (*gĕ*ʿ*ar*, to exorcise); Zech. 3:2; Ps. 68:30 [68:31 MT]; 106:9; Jub. 10.5–9; 1QapGen 20.28–29; 1QM 14.10; Kee 1967–68; Stauffer, TDNT 2:625–26; Jastrow 1903: 261; BDB 172.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the "secrets of God" (רזי אל, rzy ʾ*l*): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to "new" revelation and other times to "clarifying" revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to "clarifying" revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

46 Ellis appeals to Qumran usage for support (1QpHab 2.7; 7.2) and equates it to the “last hour” in 1 John 2:18. Maddox 1982: 114 rightly asks if Qumran can deliver this extended force.

46 Ellis appeals to Qumran usage for support (1QpHab 2.7; 7.2) and equates it to the “last hour” in 1 John 2:18. Maddox 1982: 114 rightly asks if Qumran can deliver this extended force.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

33 On the phrase “Moses and the prophets,” see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

37 1QS 1.10; 2.4–9; 9.21–23; Ellis 1974: 114; Guelich 1982: 226. The leaning of the imprecatory Psalms in this direction is what makes their tone so difficult. Because Jesus’ ethic is a heightening of old standards, they appear in antithesis in Matthew. It is right to call for God’s justice, but it is also important to seek the best for fellow humans. God’s justice is in place and will occur, as the eschatological remarks of the sermon make clear. But the disciple seeks the enemies’ transformation and hopes that they may come to know God so that they can enter into God’s grace and kindness, while escaping his wrath.

24 Manson’s suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall’s choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means “to cut off from the midst of” and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 921 notes other names used for Satan in Judaism: Belial (2 Cor. 6:15; 1QS 1.18, 24), Mast\;emah (1QS 3.23; 1QM 13.4; Jub. 10.8), and Asmodeus (Tob. 3:8, 17).

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the “two spirits” of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 921 notes other names used for Satan in Judaism: Belial (2 Cor. 6:15; 1QS 1.18, 24), Mast\;emah (1QS 3.23; 1QM 13.4; Jub. 10.8), and Asmodeus (Tob. 3:8, 17).

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

38 Prov. 12:10; Sir. 30:7; T. Naph. 4.5; T. Levi 4.4; 1QS 1.22; 2.1; Plummer 1896: 43; Marshall 1978: 94; Fitzmyer 1981: 386; Kö;ster, TDNT 7:556. The English equivalent term is heart.

37 1QS 1.10; 2.4–9; 9.21–23; Ellis 1974: 114; Guelich 1982: 226. The leaning of the imprecatory Psalms in this direction is what makes their tone so difficult. Because Jesus' ethic is a heightening of old standards, they appear in antithesis in Matthew. It is right to call for God's justice, but it is also important to seek the best for fellow humans. God's justice is in place and will occur, as the eschatological remarks of the sermon make clear. But the disciple seeks the enemies' transformation and hopes that they may come to know God so that they can enter into God’s grace and kindness, while escaping his wrath.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

24 Manson’s suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall’s choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means “to cut off from the midst of” and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the “two spirits” of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

18 On Isa. 40: 1QS 8.12–15; 9.19–21; on repentance: 1QS 5.13–14; 3.1–9; on the baptisms of cleansing: CD 10.10–13.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the “two spirits” of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

29 The Qumran scrolls also refer to the “secrets of God” (רזי אל, rzy ʾl): 1QpHab 7.8; 1QS 3.23; 1QM 3.9; 16.9, 14; 17.9, 17 (Fitzmyer 1981: 708). On μυστήριον in the NT, sometimes referring to “new” revelation and other times to “clarifying” revelation, see Bock 1994a: 80–85. In these parables, μυστήριον refers to “clarifying” revelation, which means that additional truth is connected to old promises, since Matt. 13:51–52 compares the mystery kingdom parables to old and new things.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 921 notes other names used for Satan in Judaism: Belial (2 Cor. 6:15; 1QS 1.18, 24), Mast\;emah (1QS 3.23; 1QM 13.4; Jub. 10.8), and Asmodeus (Tob. 3:8, 17).

15 At Qumran, the Spirit of truth is the light that illumines human hearts; 1QS 4.2; Grundmann 1963: 243. The OT image is found in Job 29:3; Ps. 112:4; Isa. 42:6–7; 45:7; 59:9–10; Mic. 7:8; Fitzmyer 1985: 940. The body is a metonymy of container for contents and refers to the person.

8 Jub. 9.15; 36.10; 1 Enoch 10.6; 54.6; 90.24–27; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 7:36–38; 13:4; Ps. Sol. 15.4–7; 2 Bar 48.39; T. Abr. (A) 14.11; 1QH 3.28–31; 6.18–19; 1QS 2.8, 15; 4.13; Dunn 1970a: 12 n. 11; Schulz 1972: 376 n. 347 (who rightly notes this is an apocalyptic image applied to Jesus, not something that describes his first coming).

33 Cf. “times of the age” in Tob. 14:4–5 and “season of visitation” in 1QS 4.18–19. C. A. Evans 1990: 313 notes that this hope is a decisive argument against J. T. Sanders’s claim (1987: 216–19) that Luke is anti-Semitic (he does see a future time when Israel will have a key role).

18 Jer. 31:31–33 [as writing the law on the heart]; Joel 2:28–32 [3:1–5 MT]; 1QS 4.21–22; Danker 1988: 64; SB 2:126–27; R. Meyer, TDNT 6:816–20, 826–27. On the view of some in ancient Judaism that the Spirit’s revelatory work ceased sometime before the Maccabean period, see 1 Macc. 9:27; 14:41.

19 1QS 5.13; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.2–13 §§119–61. Bringing Josephus’s description into consideration assumes that the Qumran community is Essene, a stance defended by Dupont-Sommer 1961: 39–67. Despite recent objections raised because of the find of Miqsāt Maʿăsê Tôrâ (4QMMT) at Qumran, this is still the best option.

18 On Isa. 40: 1QS 8.12–15; 9.19–21; on repentance: 1QS 5.13–14; 3.1–9; on the baptisms of cleansing: CD 10.10–13.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

18 On Isa. 40: 1QS 8.12–15; 9.19–21; on repentance: 1QS 5.13–14; 3.1–9; on the baptisms of cleansing: CD 10.10–13.

33 On the phrase "Moses and the prophets," see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

24 Manson's suggestion (1949: 118) of an Aramaic mistranslation is unlikely, even though it is a common position (see Jeremias 1963a: 57 nn. 30–31). One can argue for a purposely emotive figure without having to resort to mistranslation. Marshall 1978: 543 lays out a full set of options: figurative, mistranslation, literal, and overliteral translation of the Aramaic. The last is Marshall's choice, following O. Betz 1964–66, who notes a parallel idiom at Qumran. In 1QS 2.16, the term means "to cut off from the midst of" and refers to those who were accursed eternally (so 1QS 1.10–11; 6.24–25; 7.1–2, 16; 8.21–23). The idiom refers to those who suffer eschatological judgment, not excommunication. See also Weiser 1971: 199–200 and Ellingworth 1980. Those rejected like this often have treated others poorly or have taken advantage of them (Ps. 37:12, 14, 16, 32). The idiomatic background denotes complete separation.

4 Judaism also had hopes of priestly messianic figures; see 1QS 9.11 and Neusner, Green, and Frerichs 1987.

13 T. Levi 18 has a messianic flavor to it, but this is an Aaronic Messiah, a priestly Messiah; cf. 1QS 9.11.

18 On Isa. 40: 1QS 8.12–15; 9.19–21; on repentance: 1QS 5.13–14; 3.1–9; on the baptisms of cleansing: CD 10.10–13.

37 1QS 1.10; 2.4–9; 9.21–23; Ellis 1974: 114; Guelich 1982: 226. The leaning of the imprecatory Psalms in this direction is what makes their tone so difficult. Because Jesus' ethic is a heightening of old standards, they appear in antithesis in Matthew. It is right to call for God's justice, but it is also important to seek the best for fellow humans. God's justice is in place and will occur, as the eschatological remarks of the sermon make clear. But the disciple seeks the enemies' transformation and hopes that they may come to know God so that they can enter into God's grace and kindness, while escaping his wrath.

21 The exact phrase is unattested elsewhere, but at Qumran the phrases wealth of evil (CD 6.15) and wealth of violence (1QS 10.19) occur.

12 BAGD 375; BAA 762; cf. Ps. 51:1, 3 [51:3, 5 MT]; 25:11; 34:6, 18 [34:7, 19 MT]; 78:38; 79:9; 2 Kings 5:18; 1QS 11.3–5, 10–12; 1QH 11.15–22. Ἱλάσκομαι appears in the NT only here and in Heb. 2:17.

12 BAGD 375; BAA 762; cf. Ps. 51:1, 3 [51:3, 5 MT]; 25:11; 34:6, 18 [34:7, 19 MT]; 78:38; 79:9; 2 Kings 5:18; 1QS 11.3–5, 10–12; 1QH 11.15–22. Ἱλάσκομαι appears in the NT only here and in Heb. 2:17.

19 On γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, see Job 11:2c [not in MT]; 11:12 [≠ MT's sense]; 14:1; 15:14; 25:4; Büchsel, TDNT 1:672. Fitzmyer 1981: 675 gives Qumran parallels from 1QS 11.21; 1QH 13.14; 18.12–13, 16, 23–24. He also notes Gospel of Thomas 46.1. The parallel in Matt. 11:11 is the only other NT use of the phrase.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

6 For a methodological assessment of this debate, see R. Miller 1991. Sanders is unaware of Eppstein's 1964 article (see n. 1). Some in Judaism saw the temple as corrupt; 1 Enoch 89.73–90.29; 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.1–12. Meier 1994: 886 rightly calls the cleansing "prophetic action," but opts for a rejection of the temple rather than a cleansing. This ignores the connection to Isa. 56.

25 Marshall argues for a causative force here ("cause us not to succumb to temptation") citing 4Q174 [= 4QFlor] 1.8 as reflecting the Hebrew idiom. So also Talbert 1982: 130, citing Luke 4:13; 22:28; Acts 14:22; 20:19 as illustrations of this kind of request.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

7 Marshall notes that Levi's devotion to Torah is expressed in terms of a similar commitment in Deut. 33:9 and 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 15–16. Schrenk, TDNT 5:983, defines μισέω as "to set aside for."

3 1 Enoch 46–48, 62–71 and 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13 are too late to be related to this period. S. Kim 1985: 19 and n. 25 mentions that a "heavenly," redemptive figure identified alternatively with Enoch, Abel, or Melchizedek may have existed in the ancient Jewish tradition. But he notes that these claims are disputable, since the clear examples are late. He also notes (pp. 20–22) that 4Q246†, formerly 4Q243 (= 4QpsDan A^{a} = 4QpsDan ar^{a}), may prove this limitation incorrect, but it is too early to know what this text means, since all of it has not been published, and it has many gaps. Fitzmyer 1981: 209–10 argues that 1 Enoch may be relevant as a transitional move to an apocalyptic individualized use, but he treats the point as too unclear to base much on it. Kim (p. 19 n. 25) notes that all undisputed examples from 1 Enoch and 2 Esdras are later than the Gospels. The Son of Man references in Judaism are 1 Enoch 46.3–7; 48.4–10; 62.3–9, 14; 63.11; 69.27–29; 2 Esdr. [= 4 Ezra] 13; b. Sanh. 96b; 98a; Num. Rab. 13.14 on 7:12–13; Midr. ha-Gadol on Gen. 49:10; Aggadat Bereshit 4.3; 23.1 (see Strack and Stemberger 1991: 339); y. Taʿan. 65b (2.1) (= Neusner et al. 1982–93: 18.183); b. Ḥag. 14a; Tanḥuma (Buber), Toledot 70b (6.20) (= Townsend 1989: 167; see also Caragounis 1986: 134–36).

14 Jeremias 1971a: 63–68 notes no example of "my Father" in the literature. In fact, in Judaism such intimacy was avoided. Jeremias 1967b: 16–29 lists the potential Jewish parallels. Dunn 1975: 21–26 notes that Jeremias overstates the case in allowing no exceptions, but suggests that Jeremias's general portrait is correct. Plummer 1896: 296 remarks that God as the Father of Israel is an OT image; the concept of God as Father to individual people begins to appear only in intertestamental Judaism (see the texts in the previous note). Jesus' reference to "my Father" is highly unusual, though not unprecedented: 4Q372; 3 Macc. 6:3; Wis. 14:3; and Sir. 23:1 use "my Father" or "Father." In the NT, see Luke 2:49; 10:22 = Matt. 11:27; Luke 22:29; 24:49; Matt. 7:21; 10:32–33; 12:50; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10, 35; 20:23; 25:34; 26:29, 39, 53. The contrast is striking and significant.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

26 In 4QPrNab, a Jewish exorcist remits sins of the Babylonian King Nabonidus; Dupont-Sommer 1961: 322, esp. n. 3. The problem with this fragmentary Qumran parallel is that the method of expressing forgiveness to the king is not described in the text, but only summarized. Consequently, it can hardly carry the weight of the case for a prophetic understanding in Luke. See the exegesis of 5:24 and Bock 1991c: 117 and n. 26.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

20 Hendriksen 1978: 291. Fitzmyer 1981: 575 notes a Qumran text on this topic: 11QTemple^{a} 48.17–49.4. At Qumran, lepers were also isolated to prevent additional defiling.

5 Carefully surveying the historical background to the trial scenes and crucifixion in a Jewish setting, O. Betz 1982 argues for the historical coherence and integrity of the Marcan account as well as for its chronological priority (against Catchpole and Green in n. 4 above). He suggests that the temple charge, which Luke lacks, raised the issue of Jesus' authority and, in the view of the Jews, made him a risk to begin a chain of events that ultimately would lead Rome to take the temple and Jerusalem (John 11:47–52). The messianic confession only highlighted the danger in their view. This could be called blasphemous in the sense that someone causing God's people to be handed over to the nations would be guilty of his name being blasphemed (11QTemple[a] 64.6–13). Betz's study raises one potential element that could have set up the decisive Jewish negative reaction to Jesus (for another, more direct cause, see the exegesis of 22:69). I am not certain, however, that it is as important to choose between the Lucan and Marcan accounts as other scholars seem prone to believe. Gospel writers could incorporate older source materials despite the age of their composition.

27 Gressmann 1911 notes the nature of the customs. Perles's attempt (1919–20) to suggest an Aramaic element תבל (tbl) behind the tradition that should be translated "seasoning" instead of "soil" fails on lexical grounds. The תבל/γῆ interchange is found in Isa. 14:21; 26:9, 18; 1 Chron. 16:30; cf. 11QtgJob 24.8; 29.3 with Job 34:13; 37:12. Correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1069–70 and Black 1967: 166–67.

27 Gressmann 1911 notes the nature of the customs. Perles's attempt (1919–20) to suggest an Aramaic element תבל (tbl) behind the tradition that should be translated "seasoning" instead of "soil" fails on lexical grounds. The תבל/γῆ interchange is found in Isa. 14:21; 26:9, 18; 1 Chron. 16:30; cf. 11QtgJob 24.8; 29.3 with Job 34:13; 37:12. Correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1069–70 and Black 1967: 166–67.

16 Note that Luke 10:10–16; John 4:31–38; Rom. 11:16–24; 1 Cor. 3:6–7 use the same image, although the last three texts lack judgment overtones. A similar usage is found at Qumran (1QS 8.5–6; CD 1.7; 1QH 8.4–11) and in Judaism (Odes Sol. 38.17–21; SB 1:720–21). Hauck, TDNT 3:133, and Wiefel 1988: 197 note Joel 3:13 [4:13 MT]; Hos. 6:11; Isa. 27:11–12, as OT texts where Israel is seen as wheat among Gentile chaff. For an eschatological use of the imagery that looks at consummation, see Matt. 13:36–43; Rev. 14:15. Nolland 1993a: 550–51 argues for a slightly distinct use from the OT, since the call is to enter the kingdom with less concern about judgment. But the options are clear in Luke 10:8–11.

26 11QMelch applies Isa. 61 to Melchizedek; J. A. Sanders 1975: 89–91 (who adds 1QH 18.14–15); M. Miller 1969; Nolland 1989: 196 (who notes CD 2.12 and 1QM 11.7). In 1QM 11.7, the figure has priestly and messianic qualities.

5 BDB 966; BAGD 744; BAA 1490; 1 Chron. 21:1; Job 1:9–11. At Qumran and in other Jewish writings, Satan was frequently called Beliar or Belial; CD 4.13; 1QS 1.18, 24; 2.19; Jub. 10.11; T. Dan 5.1, 6; T. Ben. 6.1; Life of Adam and Eve 13.1. See also the "two spirits" of good and evil in 1QS 3.13–4.25; Nolland 1993b: 1030. J. Green 1988: 232–33 notes a conceptual parallel in the Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 3.11 and 5.1, where Satan prompts Manasseh to seize Isaiah and saw him in two (an action that may be alluded to in Heb. 11:37). On the background to the figure Satan, see the exegesis of Luke 4:2.

33 On the phrase "Moses and the prophets," see Luke 16:16, 31; 24:27, 44; 1QS 1.3; 8.15–16; CD 5.21–6.1. The combination is not found in formal Judaism; SB 4:415–17; Marshall 1978: 639. On the theme that God has so revealed himself in the OT that neglect makes one culpable, see Lorenzen 1975–76.

21 The exact phrase is unattested elsewhere, but at Qumran the phrases wealth of evil (CD 6.15) and wealth of violence (1QS 10.19) occur.

42 CD 7.18–19; 1QM 11.6; 4Q175 [= 4QTestim] 12; 4Q161 [= 4QpIsa^{a}]; T. Levi 18.3. T. Levi 4.3–4 is an interesting parallel, but it is debated whether a Christian interpolation is present; H. Kee in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.789 n. 4b. Fitzmyer 1981: 387 cites the texts. On the tribe of Judah as the locale of the messianic, regal hope, see T. Naph. 8.2; T. Sim. 7.1–2; Wiefel 1988: 65.

18 On Isa. 40: 1QS 8.12–15; 9.19–21; on repentance: 1QS 5.13–14; 3.1–9; on the baptisms of cleansing: CD 10.10–13.

14 Ellis 1974: 186 notes that the Qumranians in general were even stricter than the Pharisees; K. Schubert 1957: 127–28. CD 11.13–14 reads, “No one shall help an animal in its delivery on the Sabbath day. And if it falls into a pit or a ditch, one shall not raise it on the Sabbath.” For details of Jewish practice, see the exegesis of the next verse.

20 In fact, in many traditions “overshadowing” such a corpse rendered one unclean; E. Sanders 1990: 33–35. Pharisees were particularly sensitive to this issue (Num. 19:11–22; Lev. 21:1–3; m. Dem. 2.3), as were the Essenes at Qumran (CD 12.15–18). This was a common Jewish concept; Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.3 §§36–38.

5 Hengel 1968 and Derrett 1970: 286–312 discuss the ancient customs that provide the historical background for this parable. Such tenants would work for a commission (m. Kil. 4–6 describes laws governing vineyards; Mur 24b–e [DJD 2:124–32] gives details of a tenant arrangement; Derrett 1970: 293–94). Derrett argues that if the vineyard could be shown to have been “abandoned” by the owner, it would revert to the tenants if they had worked the land for three years (m. B. Bat. 3.1; Jeremias 1963a: 74–75; Dodd 1961: 97). Such a cultural background gives context to the parable, though it is comprehensible without it (correctly Fitzmyer 1985: 1283).

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

32 P. Tebt. vol. 1 #43 lines 26, 36; P. Oxy. vol. 3 #472 line 33 (A.D.. 130). BAGD 776 cites Lysias 26.24 (177) as well as Luke 19:8, though it interprets the term in Luke 3:14 as "harass, accuse falsely."

7 Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον means "that which falls to me"; Tob. 3:17; 6:12; P. Oxy. vol. 4 #715 lines 13–15; Creed 1930: 198; Hauck, TDNT 1:529; MM 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 1087. As a noun, οὐσίας refers to property; Tob. 14:13; 3 Macc. 3:28; Josephus, Antiquities 7.5.5 §114. On διεῖλεν (he divided), see Schlier, TDNT 1:184.

12 Acts 11:28; Michel, TDNT 5:157; P. Oxy. vol. 7 #1021 line 5; Fitzmyer 1981: 400. The remark may be rhetorical and partially hyperbolic (cf. Col. 1:6: "to the whole world").

4 Ps. 130:1 LXX [131:1 Engl.]; Josephus, Antiquities 16.4.6 §135; Marshall 1978: 529; Deissner, TDNT 4:630–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 980; BAGD 514; BAA 1041; P. Oxy. vol. 14 #1679 line 16 (where it is a term for "wrong").

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

32 P. Tebt. vol. 1 #43 lines 26, 36; P. Oxy. vol. 3 #472 line 33 (A.D.. 130). BAGD 776 cites Lysias 26.24 (177) as well as Luke 19:8, though it interprets the term in Luke 3:14 as "harass, accuse falsely."

32 P. Tebt. vol. 1 #43 lines 26, 36; P. Oxy. vol. 3 #472 line 33 (A.D.. 130). BAGD 776 cites Lysias 26.24 (177) as well as Luke 19:8, though it interprets the term in Luke 3:14 as "harass, accuse falsely."

16 Αὐστηρός (severe, strict, exacting) is used in the NT only in this pericope (twice); also 2 Macc. 14:30. In P. Tebt. vol. 2 #315 line 19, the term is used of a demanding financial inspector; MM 93; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

1 On the Jewish use of genealogies, see C. F. Evans 1990: 251–53. Such lists were available to some in the first century. Josephus, Life 1 §§3–6 and Against Apion 1.7 §§30–36 limits such lists to priestly families.

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life 65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

22 Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218; Haenchen 1961.

24 See Plummer 1896: 4 for a defense of παρακολουθέω with this meaning; BAGD 619 §3 cites other ancient texts; also BAA 64. Among them are the already noted texts by Josephus: Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218. See Du Plessis 1974: 267.

29 Josephus liked this term to describe his work; see Against Apion 1.10 §53; Jewish War 1.proem.6 §17; Du Plessis 1974: 268 n. 50.

14 Rengstorf, TDNT 8:543; also Michaelis, TDNT 5:348, 373. Luke will call these men "witnesses" later in Luke–Acts (Luke 24:44–48; Acts 1:8). Such eyewitnesses were important to ancient historians: Thucydides 1.22.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §55; and Lucian's parody in How to Write History 4. See Du Plessis 1974: 265.

22 Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218; Haenchen 1961.

24 See Plummer 1896: 4 for a defense of παρακολουθέω with this meaning; BAGD 619 §3 cites other ancient texts; also BAA 64. Among them are the already noted texts by Josephus: Against Apion 1.10 §53 and 1.23 §218. See Du Plessis 1974: 267.

9 Life 1 §2 and Antiquities 7.14.7 §§363–67 attribute the twenty-four groups to David and allude to 1 Chron. 24:31; see also Against Apion 2.8 §108.

18 For a variety of regulations on the reading of the Law, see Josephus, Against Apion 2.17 §175; Acts 15:21; m. Meg. 2.4; 3.4; 4.1–2, 4, 6, 10. I draw heavily on the Mishnah here, despite its later date (ca. A.D.. 170), because synagogue tradition as liturgy was likely to have been conservative in its development and because the synagogue was an old institution by this point.

2 M. Soṭa 3.4 shows that some rabbis were against any instruction for women, while others thought it advisable. Josephus expresses a negative attitude toward women when he argues that the law says they are inferior to men in all things (Against Apion 2.24 §201). The connection of this text to Josephus is debated, since he does occasionally praise women, such as Alexandra (Antiquities 13.16.6 §§430–31). However, that she is regarded as an exception shows Josephus's general attitude.

17 This view of the king's sternness is conceptually like Josephus's description of a law that punishes slaves more harshly; Against Apion 2.30 §216; C. Taylor 1901; Plato, Laws 913c (11); Brightman 1927–28; Philo, Hypothetica 7.6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

17 Παραβιάζομαι usually means “to use force” on someone, but here “quiet persuasion” is meant, which is similar to the use of the unprefixed form in the difficult 16:16. On the importance of hospitality in Judaism, see Philo, On Abraham 22 §§107–13; Josephus, Antiquities 1.11.2 §196.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21;

Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

69 Josephus, Antiquities 2.10.2 §250, describes the protection developed to fight swollen rivers in Egypt; also Job 40:23. For πλήμμυρα (only here in the NT), see BAGD 669 and BAA 1345.

18 Josephus ties the origin of Jewish exorcism to the days of Solomon; Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; 2.13.3 §286; Tob. 6:1–7; 8:1–3; 1QapGen 20.29; SB 4:533–35; Grundmann 1963: 238; Talbert 1982: 137.

8 Pickl argues for this distinction by comparing Josephus, Antiquities 3.10.5 §249 and 2.15.1 §317. Jeremias argues that the second text addresses Diaspora practice about all festivals and as such does not apply.

9 Luke 7:37, 38, 46; 23:56; BAGD 529–30; BAA 1072; Michaelis, TDNT 4:800–801; Schürmann 1969: 432 n. 10. The importance of μύρον is shown by its use as perfume and its presence in the cult to purify priests, in the tabernacle for festal occasions, and by its use in burial to prevent stench and decay; Exod. 30:25–30; Josephus, Antiquities 3.8.6 §205; 19.9.1 §358; Luke 23:56. If this perfume were nard (Mark 14:3 = John 12:3), it would have cost about 300 denarii a pound, or the annual wage of a day laborer; BAGD 534; BAA 1080.

8 Pickl argues for this distinction by comparing Josephus, Antiquities 3.10.5 §249 and 2.15.1 §317. Jeremias argues that the second text addresses Diaspora practice about all festivals and as such does not apply.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

8 On the rare use of ἀπολύω as a description of being freed from the effects of disease, see BAGD 96; BAA 193; Josephus, Antiquities 3.11.3 §264. The term is generally used of freeing prisoners or releasing from debt. This common usage may inform the use of the term here. Contextually, the perfect tense announces entry into a state of healing; Arndt 1956: 329.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

15 Measures in the ancient world varied somewhat, so an exact figure is uncertain; see Plummer 1896: 383 and Marshall 1978: 619. BAGD 445 places the measure of a cor at 393 liters or 10–12 bushels. Fitzmyer 1985: 1101 points out that Josephus defines κόρος variously: Antiquities 15.9.2 §314 says that it equals 10 medimnoi, while Antiquities 3.15.3 §321 says four-sevenths of a medimnos—a significant difference (a medimnos was an Attic measure that equaled about 1.5 bushels, a figure that seems very high and is thus questioned). Fitzmyer figures the amount on Josephus's smaller standard, which produces a debt of slightly more than 100 bushels, but he notes that the variation makes certainty difficult.

18 Three main OT texts deal with the tithe (E. Sanders 1990: 43–45). (1) According to Deut. 14:22–27, ten percent of farm produce, oil, and wine was to be tithed, except in the seventh year (Lev. 25:2–7). It was to be spent and enjoyed in Jerusalem or another appropriate locale. Every third year, this tithe was given to the Levites and the needy (Deut. 14:28–29). Whether "third year" meant only the third of the seven-year cycle or years three and six was debated, but the latter view was more popular. (2) Lev. 27:30–33 required that ten percent of crops and animals be tithed to the priesthood (Josephus, Antiquities 4.4.4 §§69–75). (3) Num. 18:21–32 declared that food be set aside for the Levites and their families. Other OT passages that give the background of tithes are Deut. 12:6–9; 26:12–15; Num. 18:12; Neh. 10:37–38 [10:38–39 MT]; 12:44; 13:5, 12; 2 Chron. 31:5–12; Fitzmyer 1985: 948.

9 "Leaders of the people" resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke's account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

9 "Leaders of the people" resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke's account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

7 The farewell discourse in John 14–17 is another distinct account involving this setting. For biblical and Greco-Roman parallels, see Kurz 1985 and Neyrey 1985: 5–48. Biblical and Jewish precedent for the discourse is found in Gen. 49 (Jacob's final address); Deut. 33 (Moses); Josh. 23 (Joshua); 1 Macc. 2:49–70 (Mattathias); Tob. 4:3–21 (Tobit); the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; and Josephus, Antiquities 4.8.1–48 §§176–322 (Moses).

14 It looks as if Dillon is trying to protect a "disclosure" theme in this chapter, a view that has problems before this point in the narrative (see n. 12 above). Dillon argues for Lucan creation here, which is unlikely given the traditional themes already noted in the passion predictions and the additional materials that Luke apparently uses in his resurrection account. There is no doubt that the disciples' understanding deepens through these events and Jesus' visit with them, but faith seems to be present here in these women. It took some nerve to report what they had seen, given that women were not allowed to testify in this culture (Josephus, Antiquities 4.8.15 §219).

3 The term levirate comes from Latin levir (husband's brother); M. Burrows 1940. The practice was still used in the first century; Josephus, Antiquities 4.8.23 §§254–56.

11 Both verbs appear only here and in the parallel at Matt. 21:44. On συνθλάω, see BAGD 790; BAA 1575; Ps. 57:7 LXX [58:6 Engl.]; Mic. 3:3. On λικμάω, see BAGD 474–75; BAA 963; Dan. 2:44 [Theodotion]; Ruth 3:2; Job 27:21; Isa. 17:13; Jer. 38:10 LXX [31:10 Engl.]; Amos 9:9; Josephus, Antiquities 5.9.3 §328.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

8 Josephus refers to Joshua as Moses' disciple and to Elisha as Elijah's disciple; Antiquities 6.5.4 §84; 8.13.7 §354.

37 Godet 1875: 1.115. Bovon 1989: 108 n. 74 notes that the expression forgiveness of sins is like neither the OT nor the Christian expression. Jewish usage does occur: Philo, Life of Moses 2.29 §147; Special Laws 1.35 §190; Josephus, Antiquities 6.5.6 §92 (which discusses God's reaction to Israel's desire to elect a king in 1 Sam. 12 and the nation's confession of sin after God revealed his displeasure).

27 Fitzmyer 1981: 609. Josephus, Antiquities 6.12.1 §§242–43, does not mention the bread in describing the account. SB 1:618–19 notes the rabbinic accounts; b. Menaḥ. 95b cites a remark by Rabbi Shim<on (ca. A.D.. 150).

7 Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον means “that which falls to me”; Tob. 3:17; 6:12; P. Oxy. vol. 4 #715 lines 13–15; Creed 1930: 198; Hauck, TDNT 1:529; MM 235; Fitzmyer 1985: 1087. As a noun, οὐσίας refers to property; Tob. 14:13; 3 Macc. 3:28; Josephus, Antiquities 7.5.5 §114. On διεῖλεν (he divided), see Schlier, TDNT 1:184.

7 Josephus, Antiquities 7.11.6 §280; 8.8.1–2 §§214, 218; Fitzmyer 1981: 781; Delling, TDNT 8:220. However, no allusion to Hos. 6:2 is present in the reference to the third day, since this passage is never directly alluded to in the NT. The reference to ἡμέρα (day) is inclusive in each case, so that Friday, Saturday, and Sunday are in view in both “after three days” and “on the third day.”

6 BAGD 608 and BAA 1230–31 list the options. Klostermann 1929: 144–45 cites Heb. 7:25 as a grammatical parallel. Plummer 1896: 342 notes that παντελής always appears next to the term it modifies in Josephus: Antiquities 1.18.5 §267; 3.11.3 §264; 3.12.1 §274; 6.2.3 §30; 7.13.3 §325.

9 Life 1 §2 and Antiquities 7.14.7 §§363–67 attribute the twenty-four groups to David and allude to 1 Chron. 24:31; see also Against Apion 2.8 §108.

11 Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§42–49, mentions the healing skill of Solomon, thus providing a base for this description of David’s son. This view is contrary to Nolland 1993b: 900, who argues against a Jewish expectation of a Davidic healer. His point is correct, but these traditions raise the question of what connections Jesus’ acts of healing might surface. With all the eschatological ferment in Palestine in this period, why deny the possibility of such reflection on such events? Meier 1994: 689 is certainly correct to see the connection as not surprising in this setting.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

19 Ellis 1974: 100; Plummer 1896: 134. Compare Tob. 8:1–3; Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49 (where the reference is to the powers that Solomon—a regal figure—possessed over evil forces); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 85. Nolland 1989: 210 notes eight different methods that Jesus used in his various healings in Luke, all of which involve his word or personal touch.

18 Josephus ties the origin of Jewish exorcism to the days of Solomon; Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; 2.13.3 §286; Tob. 6:1–7; 8:1–3; 1QapGen 20.29; SB 4:533–35; Grundmann 1963: 238; Talbert 1982: 137.

13 Jeremias 1963a: 181 notes that the average olive tree yields 120 kilos of olives or 25 liters of oil. Kistemaker 1980: 231 and Manson 1949: 291–92 put the number more precisely at 868 gallons or 3,946 liters, using the scale provided by Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.9 §57. Marshall 1978: 618–19 notes that ancient measuring jars found in archeological digs vary from 5 gallons to 10 gallons. Given this variation, precise numbers are difficult to determine, but the number is not as important as recognizing that this is a large debt.

17 Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13; Zech. 14:16–21; Marshall 1978: 386; Michaelis, TDNT 7:370; m. Sukka (esp. 3.9 and 4.5, which call the people to pray to God to deliver them, and 4.8, where Hallel Psalms are sung); Josephus, Antiquities 8.4.1 §100.

7 Josephus, Antiquities 7.11.6 §280; 8.8.1–2 §§214, 218; Fitzmyer 1981: 781; Delling, TDNT 8:220. However, no allusion to Hos. 6:2 is present in the reference to the third day, since this passage is never directly alluded to in the NT. The reference to ἡμέρα (day) is inclusive in each case, so that Friday, Saturday, and Sunday are in view in both “after three days” and “on the third day.”

7 Josephus, Antiquities 7.11.6 §280; 8.8.1–2 §§214, 218; Fitzmyer 1981: 781; Delling, TDNT 8:220. However, no allusion to Hos. 6:2 is present in the reference to the third day, since this passage is never directly alluded to in the NT. The reference to ἡμέρα (day) is inclusive in each case, so that Friday, Saturday, and Sunday are in view in both “after three days” and “on the third day.”

41 On Zarephath, see Josephus, Antiquities 8.13.2 §320; Fitzmyer 1981: 538.

8 Josephus refers to Joshua as Moses’ disciple and to Elisha as Elijah’s disciple; Antiquities 6.5.4 §84; 8.13.7 §354.

10 Σάτον occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 13:33; BAGD 745; BAA 1490; also in Josephus, Antiquities 9.4.4 §71; 9.4.5 §85; Gen. 18:6; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24. Nolland 1993a: 730 questions this connection, since the LXX does not connect σάτον to סְאָה. If he is right, the amount is unclear. But a Semitic context for the parable makes a specific connection likely.

10 Σάτον occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 13:33; BAGD 745; BAA 1490; also in Josephus, Antiquities 9.4.4 §71; 9.4.5 §85; Gen. 18:6; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24. Nolland 1993a: 730 questions this connection, since the LXX does not connect σάτον to סְאָה. If he is right, the amount is unclear. But a Semitic context for the parable makes a specific connection likely.

9 Grundmann 1963: 242 argues that Jonah was seen as a sign in Judaism because of his miraculous deliverance from the whale; see SB 1:642–49. But these Jewish references are late, as Fitzmyer 1985: 935–36 notes, adding that Josephus’s account of Jonah (Antiquities 9.10.2 §§208–14) makes nothing of the fish episode.

9 For OT prophetic suffering, see 1 Kings 18:4, 13; 19:10, 14; 2 Chron. 24:21; Jer. 2:30; 26:20–23; 38:4–6; Amos 7:10–17; Josephus, Antiquities 10.3.1 §38; Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 5.1–14; Acts 7:52.

9 "Leaders of the people" resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke's account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

8 Josephus, Antiquities 10.5.2 §83 (of Jehoiakim); Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 10.10.7; Livy 22.3.4. Ἐντρέπω is used in Luke 20:13 = Matt. 21:37 = Mark 12:6 to describe the respect that the master's son should get; elsewhere in the NT at 1 Cor. 4:14; 2 Thess. 3:14; Titus 2:8; Heb. 12:9; BAGD 269 §2b; BAA 544 §2b. On not fearing God, see Deut. 25:18 (of the Amalekites).

9 "Leaders of the people" resisted Paul and Barnabas; Acts 13:50; cf. 17:4; 25:2; 28:7, 17; Josephus, Antiquities 4.6.9 §140; 4.7.5 §174; 10.4.5 §71; 10.10.5 §213. See Michaelis, TDNT 6:866, for extrabiblical examples. Nolland 1993b: 940 notes the various combinations with which Luke refers to the leadership in Luke 20–24. They are a major narrative group for Luke's account, almost having a corporate personality that acts in concert against Jesus. Key verses are 20:1, 19; 22:2, 52, 66; 23:10, 13, 35; 24:20.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380;

17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

18 The verse is loaded with business terms: ἀργύριον (money; BAGD 104 §2b; BAA 211 §2b; elsewhere in the NT at Matt. 25:18, 27; 26:15 = Mark 14:11 = Luke 22:5; Matt. 27:3, 5, 6, 9; 28:12, 15; Luke 9:3; 19:15; Acts 3:6; 7:16; 8:20; 19:19; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18), τράπεζα (bank [lit., table]; BAGD 824; BAA 1643 §4; MM 639–40; Goppelt, TDNT 8:211 §A3; fifteen times in the NT, e.g., Matt. 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = John 2:15; cf. Josephus, Antiquities 12.2.3 §28; the term looks to the financial table where deals are done), τόκος (interest; BAGD 821; BAA 1637; elsewhere in the NT only at Matt. 25:27; cf. Exod. 22:25 [22:24 LXX]; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19 [23:20 LXX]), and πράσσω (to collect; BAGD 698 §1b; BAA 1400 §1b; earlier in Luke at 3:13).

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

28 Michel, TDNT 8:98–99. The rate ranged from 2 percent to 10 percent in the empire itself. Josephus describes some tax decrees (Antiquities 14.10.5–6 §§200–209), explains the bidding for tax collection (Antiquities 12.4.3 §169), and mentions some exemptions (Antiquities 12.3.3 §143). See also 1 Macc. 10:26–31; 11:28, 34–36; 13:34 for exemptions and relief in an earlier period.

25 In Antiquities 12.4.2–9 §§160–220, Josephus has a vivid story of such a crafty collector, Joseph, who extorted much money during the rule of Ptolemy V.

28 Michel, TDNT 8:98–99. The rate ranged from 2 percent to 10 percent in the empire itself. Josephus describes some tax decrees (Antiquities 14.10.5–6 §§200–209), explains the bidding for tax collection (Antiquities 12.4.3 §169), and mentions some exemptions (Antiquities 12.3.3 §143). See also 1 Macc. 10:26–31; 11:28, 34–36; 13:34 for exemptions and relief in an earlier period.

23 Josephus, Antiquities 13.5.9 §171; 13.10.6 §§293–98; 17.2.4–3.1 §§41–51; 18.1.2 §11; Jewish War 2.8.14 §§162–63; C. F. Evans 1990: 298–

99.

23 Josephus, Antiquities 13.5.9 §171; 13.10.6 §§293–98; 17.2.4–3.1 §§41–51; 18.1.2 §11; Jewish War 2.8.14 §§162–63; C. F. Evans 1990: 298–99.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

13 Διατίθημι has the meaning "to assign" in Josephus, Antiquities 13.16.1 §407; BAGD 189–90 §3; BAA 381 §2; Behm, TDNT 2:104–6.

2 M. Soṭa 3.4 shows that some rabbis were against any instruction for women, while others thought it advisable. Josephus expresses a negative attitude toward women when he argues that the law says they are inferior to men in all things (Against Apion 2.24 §201). The connection of this text to Josephus is debated, since he does occasionally praise women, such as Alexandra (Antiquities 13.16.6 §§430–31). However, that she is regarded as an exception shows Josephus's general attitude.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

3 Carson cites texts where πάσχα can mean Passover week: Josephus, Antiquities 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; Jewish War 2.1.3 §10; m. Pesaḥ. 9.5.

7 The title βασιλεύς dominates the passion accounts: Matt. 27:11, 29, 37, 42; Mark 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32; Luke 23:2, 3, 37, 38; John 18:33, 37 (twice), 39; 19:3, 12, 14, 15 (twice), 19, 21 (twice). In Josephus, Antiquities 14.3.1 §36; 15.10.5 §373; 16.10.2 §311, it refers to various Hasmoneans or Herod the Great. Such an independent kingship could be seen as a threat to Rome.

26 Schürer 1973–87: 2.300–301, esp. n. 30; Josephus, Antiquities 14.4.3 §65; m. Pesaḥ. 5.1.

7 Schweizer 1984: 20. Herod's reaction in Matt. 2 seems to confirm that this is Herod's view, although the Josephus reference (Antiquities 14.9 §§156–84) cited by Schweizer appears not to make a Davidic point; rather, it highlights his regal self-awareness.

28 Michel, TDNT 8:98–99. The rate ranged from 2 percent to 10 percent in the empire itself. Josephus describes some tax decrees (Antiquities 14.10.5–6 §§200–209), explains the bidding for tax collection (Antiquities 12.4.3 §169), and mentions some exemptions (Antiquities 12.3.3 §143). See also 1 Macc. 10:26–31; 11:28, 34–36; 13:34 for exemptions and relief in an earlier period.

9 Schürmann 1969: 100. R. Brown 1977: 549 allows this as a possibility. What he cannot accept is the reference to Quirinius. The Romans allowed the Jews to keep other customs: tax exemption every seventh year (Josephus, Antiquities 14.10.6 §§202–10) and Sabbath observance (Antiquities 14.10.20 §§241–43).

9 Schürmann 1969: 100. R. Brown 1977: 549 allows this as a possibility. What he cannot accept is the reference to Quirinius. The Romans allowed the Jews to keep other customs: tax exemption every seventh year (Josephus, Antiquities 14.10.6 §§202–10) and Sabbath observance (Antiquities 14.10.20 §§241–43).

23 On Abraham as father and the Jews as his children, see Luke 1:73; 13:16; 19:9. Josephus called Abraham “the father of all Hebrews”; Antiquities 14.10.22 §255.

27 For example, the sun turned away from Mark Antony’s enemies (Josephus, Antiquities 14.12.3 §309), and many heavenly portents came with the temple’s destruction (Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §§288–300).

3 “In those days” is a frequent Lucan expression: Luke 1:39; 6:12; 24:18; Acts 1:15; 11:27; Fitzmyer 1985: 1481. On the racial origins of the Herodians as half-Jewish, see Josephus, Antiquities 14.15.2 §403. On Herod’s presence in Jerusalem during a feast, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.3 §122.

3 Manson 1949: 278 notes a passage in Theophrastus, Characters 21.2, where the sign of a proud man is that he seeks the seat beside the host. Lev.

Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (commenting on Prov. 25:7) has a similar exhortation for people to stay two or three seats down; see also Josephus, Antiquities 15.2.4 §21.

4 Matt. 20:29 = Mark 10:46; Heb. 11:30; BAGD 372; BAA 756. The new Jericho was given to Cleopatra by Mark Antony and later came under Herod the Great's authority; Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §459, §474; Antiquities 15.4.2–4 §§96–107.

7 Danker 1988: 355–56 cites Diogenes Laertius 3.19 and 9.115 for occasions where the accused is silent. See also Wis. 8:12; Ignatius, Ephesians 15.1 and Magnesians 8.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 15.7.5 §235 (R. Brown 1994: 772).

19 Such notations by the state are common: Josephus, Antiquities 15.8.1 §272 (inscriptions that commemorate Caesar and present trophies of war); Suetonius, Caligula 32.2; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.1.44. In these other texts, the inscription is borne by the criminal or by someone in front of the cross (Nolland 1993b: 1148). Pilate's inscription stands behind the initials INRI seen in many famous paintings of this scene. INRI is an acronym for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), wording that parallels John's Gospel.

15 Measures in the ancient world varied somewhat, so an exact figure is uncertain; see Plummer 1896: 383 and Marshall 1978: 619. BAGD 445 places the measure of a cor at 393 liters or 10–12 bushels. Fitzmyer 1985: 1101 points out that Josephus defines κόρος variously: Antiquities 15.9.2 §314 says that it equals 10 medimnoi, while Antiquities 3.15.3 §321 says four-sevenths of a medimnos—a significant difference (a medimnos was an Attic measure that equaled about 1.5 bushels, a figure that seems very high and is thus questioned). Fitzmyer figures the amount on Josephus's smaller standard, which produces a debt of slightly more than 100 bushels, but he notes that the variation makes certainty difficult.

7 The title βασιλεύς dominates the passion accounts: Matt. 27:11, 29, 37, 42; Mark 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32; Luke 23:2, 3, 37, 38; John 18:33, 37 (twice), 39; 19:3, 12, 14, 15 (twice), 19, 21 (twice). In Josephus, Antiquities 14.3.1 §36; 15.10.5 §373; 16.10.2 §311, it refers to various Hasmoneans or Herod the Great. Such an independent kingship could be seen as a threat to Rome.

8 Fitzmyer 1985: 1475 notes that the title King of the Jews was bestowed on Herod by an Essene named Manaēmos; Josephus, Antiquities 15.10.5 §373.

4 Ps. 130:1 LXX [131:1 Engl.]; Josephus, Antiquities 16.4.6 §135; Marshall 1978: 529; Deissner, TDNT 4:630–31; Fitzmyer 1985: 980; BAGD 514; BAA 1041; P. Oxy. vol. 14 #1679 line 16 (where it is a term for "wrong").

11 On this title, see Luke 1:32, 35, 76. According to Josephus, Antiquities 16.6.2 §163, this was the Gentile way to refer to the God of the Jews; Luce 1933: 172. So also Plummer 1896: 229–30, citing Dan. 3:26; 4:24 [4:21 MT]; 5:18; 7:18; Bovon 1989: 429 n. 4.

7 The title βασιλεύς dominates the passion accounts: Matt. 27:11, 29, 37, 42; Mark 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32; Luke 23:2, 3, 37, 38; John 18:33, 37 (twice), 39; 19:3, 12, 14, 15 (twice), 19, 21 (twice). In Josephus, Antiquities 14.3.1 §36; 15.10.5 §373; 16.10.2 §311, it refers to various Hasmoneans or Herod the Great. Such an independent kingship could be seen as a threat to Rome.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

23 Josephus, Antiquities 13.5.9 §171; 13.10.6 §§293–98; 17.2.4–3.1 §§41–51; 18.1.2 §11; Jewish War 2.8.14 §§162–63; C. F. Evans 1990: 298–99.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

5 Herod the Great was said to have suffered from dropsy; Josephus, Antiquities 17.6.5 §§168–70. In the apocryphal Acts of Paul 4, Paul heals a man of this condition; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 2.247.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8

§§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

27 In Antiquities 17.8.4 §205, Josephus says that these taxes were "ruthlessly exacted"; in 18.4.3 §90 he notes the temporary lifting of the taxes under Caesar.

10 Josephus, Antiquities 17.9.3 §213; Jeremias, TDNT 5:898 §1. The reference in the verse to the Passover, τῇ ἑορτῇ τοῦ πάσχα, is grammatically to be taken as a dative of time: "at the time of the feast of the Passover" (Plummer 1896: 74; Luke uses a dative of time at 8:29 and 12:20).

3 Carson cites texts where πάσχα can mean Passover week: Josephus, Antiquities 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; Jewish War 2.1.3 §10; m. Pesaḥ. 9.5.

8 Jeremias 1969: 76–77; Josephus, Life 65 §354 (which notes how few Tiberians [two thousand] were in Jerusalem on one key festival occasion); Antiquities 17.9.3 §§213–14; Jewish War 2.14.3 §280; 2.1.3 §§10–12.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

13 Hoehner 1977: 16–17 cites Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.4 §319 and Jewish War 2.6.3 §96. Hayles 1974: 25–26 posits deteriorating relations between Augustus and Herod as an explanation for the census. The statement by Sherwin-White 1963: 163 n. 4 that such a census in this period is impossible is clearly excessive in light of our partial knowledge of this period.

14 Hayles 1974: 27–28 notes that Josephus does not call the census an innovation and that what was new was the administrative set-up introduced in Judea in A.D.. 6. He also notes how Josephus omits the mention of other known censuses, even in his discussion of contemporary history in the Jewish War. Josephus, Antiquities 18.1.1 §§3–4 speaks of taxation as the problem, but only as an indication of Israel’s absence of liberty.

6 So Arndt 1956: 254 argues for two Bethsaidas; otherwise Fitzmyer 1981: 765–66; Godet 1875: 1.404–5 (who sees many places with this name along the lake, since the name is a generic description); Ptolemy, Geography 5.16.4. Cf. Josephus's use of "Gaulanite" in Antiquities 18.1.1 §4 and "Galilean" in 18.1.6 §23. A region is addressed, not just a populated locale, as the dilemma about food makes clear. Bethsaida may be nothing more than temporary "headquarters" for mission in the region. Arndt and Godet may be right about the Marcan reference being a distinct locale using a generic name. John 12:21 may confirm the distinction.

23 Josephus, Antiquities 13.5.9 §171; 13.10.6 §§293–98; 17.2.4–3.1 §§41–51; 18.1.2 §11; Jewish War 2.8.14 §§162–63; C. F. Evans 1990: 298–99.

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

6 So Arndt 1956: 254 argues for two Bethsaidas; otherwise Fitzmyer 1981: 765–66; Godet 1875: 1.404–5 (who sees many places with this name along the lake, since the name is a generic description); Ptolemy, Geography 5.16.4. Cf. Josephus's use of "Gaulanite" in Antiquities 18.1.1 §4 and "Galilean" in 18.1.6 §23. A region is addressed, not just a populated locale, as the dilemma about food makes clear. Bethsaida may be nothing more than temporary “headquarters” for mission in the region. Arndt and Godet may be right about the Marcan reference being a distinct locale using a generic name. John 12:21 may confirm the distinction.

7 Josephus mentions Annas’s appointment (Antiquities 18.2.1 §26) and discusses the interim priests after Annas was deposed by Valerius Gratus (Antiquities 18.2.2 §§33–35). Five sons of Annas as well as his son-in-law Caiaphas succeeded to this office, so it is easy to see why Luke sees Annas as key. He is a patriarch to the high priesthood. The interim priests were Eleazar, son of Annas, and Simon, son of Camith, who each served one year.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

7 Josephus mentions Annas’s appointment (Antiquities 18.2.1 §26) and discusses the interim priests after Annas was deposed by Valerius Gratus (Antiquities 18.2.2 §§33–35). Five sons of Annas as well as his son-in-law Caiaphas succeeded to this office, so it is easy to see why Luke sees Annas as key. He is a patriarch to the high priesthood. The interim priests were Eleazar, son of Annas, and Simon, son of Camith, who each served one year.

8 Carson 1984: 223–24, in critique of Pesch’s view. Fitzmyer 1981: 590 is uncommitted, though he appears to lean toward equating the two names, calling two names “theoretically possible,” while noting the debate of the early church. For examples of double names, see Acts 1:23; 12:25; 13:9; double Semitic names include Joseph Barnabas (Acts 4:36) and Joseph Caiaphas (Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §35).

20 In fact, in many traditions "overshadowing" such a corpse rendered one unclean; E. Sanders 1990: 33–35. Pharisees were particularly sensitive to this issue (Num. 19:11–22; Lev. 21:1–3; m. Dem. 2.3), as were the Essenes at Qumran (CD 12.15–18). This was a common Jewish concept; Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.3 §§36–38.

5 Παιδεύω here refers to flogging; BAGD 604 §2bγ; BAA 1222 §2bγ; elsewhere in the NT with this meaning only at Luke 23:22; cf. 1 Kings 12:11, 14; 2 Chron. 10:11, 14. Mark 15:15 uses φραγελλώσας for the whipping before the crucifixion. Sherwin-White 1963: 27–28 distinguishes three types of flogging: fustes, flagella, and verbera. He may be right that Luke refers to fustigatio in terms of Pilate's initial intention, but when he gave Jesus over, the verberatio would be administered for crucifixion. R. Brown 1994: 851 questions the value of these distinctions and whether Luke's audience would know them. Regardless, the punishment came with the crucifixion.

9 On the building of aqueducts to improve the city's water supply, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.2 §60; Jewish War 2.9.4 §175; SB 2:197; Klostermann 1929: 143.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

27 In Antiquities 17.8.4 §205, Josephus says that these taxes were "ruthlessly exacted"; in 18.4.3 §90 he notes the temporary lifting of the taxes under Caesar.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

3 "In those days" is a frequent Lucan expression: Luke 1:39; 6:12; 24:18; Acts 1:15; 11:27; Fitzmyer 1985: 1481. On the racial origins of the Herodians as half-Jewish, see Josephus, Antiquities 14.15.2 §403. On Herod's presence in Jerusalem during a feast, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.3 §122.

13 BAGD 303; BAA 615; LSJ 669; Josephus, Jewish War 1.24.6 §487; Antiquities 18.6.6 §194; SB 2:164; Marshall 1978: 317; Fitzmyer 1981: 698; Hoehner 1972: 120, 303–5, 317 n. 4.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

9 For options, see BAGD 868 §4; BAA 1730; Fitzmyer 1895: 988; and Plummer 1896: 331. Josephus uses both approaches: three watches in Jewish War 5.12.2 §510 and four in Antiquities 18.9.6 §356.

9 Luke 7:37, 38, 46; 23:56; BAGD 529–30; BAA 1072; Michaelis, TDNT 4:800–801; Schürmann 1969: 432 n. 10. The importance of μύρον is shown by its use as perfume and its presence in the cult to purify priests, in the tabernacle for festal occasions, and by its use in burial to prevent stench and decay; Exod. 30:25–30; Josephus, Antiquities 3.8.6 §205; 19.9.1 §358; Luke 23:56. If this perfume were nard (Mark 14:3 = John 12:3), it would have cost about 300 denarii a pound, or the annual wage of a day laborer; BAGD 534; BAA 1080.

31 Creed 1930: 63 cites Acts of Peter 32 and Lucian, Lover of Lies 13, while Fitzmyer 1981: 511 notes Josephus's description of Theudas in Antiquities 20.5.1 §§97–98.

29 Josephus liked this term to describe his work; see Against Apion 1.10 §53; Jewish War 1.proem.6 §17; Du Plessis 1974: 268 n. 50.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

3 Josephus, Jewish War 1.5.2 §110, says that the Pharisees were "known for surpassing the others in the observances of piety and exact interpretation of the laws." Tax collectors were discussed earlier in Luke 3:12; 5:27, 30. The construction ὁ εἷς … ὁ ἕτερος (the one … the other) occurred earlier in 7:41.

16 Fitzmyer 1981: 690 and Marshall 1978: 311 mention that no specific verb for "to thank" exists in Aramaic or Hebrew. Thus, the sense of ἀγαπάω is something like that in Ps. 116:1 [114:1 LXX] or Josephus, Jewish War 1.10.2 §198. See Wood 1954–55 and Jeremias 1963a: 126–27. Fitzmyer adds that in 1QH the Hebrew verb for praise (הוֹדָה, hôdâ) is constantly used to express thanks. What is present is gratitude that also expresses appreciation and love.

13 BAGD 303; BAA 615; LSJ 669; Josephus, Jewish War 1.24.6 §487; Antiquities 18.6.6 §194; SB 2:164; Marshall 1978: 317; Fitzmyer 1981: 698; Hoehner 1972: 120, 303–5, 317 n. 4.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

3 Carson cites texts where πάσχα can mean Passover week: Josephus, Antiquities 14.2.1 §21; 17.9.3 §213; Jewish War 2.1.3 §10; m. Pesaḥ. 9.5.

8 Jeremias 1969: 76–77; Josephus, Life 65 §354 (which notes how few Tiberians [two thousand] were in Jerusalem on one key festival occasion); Antiquities 17.9.3 §§213–14; Jewish War 2.14.3 §280; 2.1.3 §§10–12.

13 Hoehner 1977: 16–17 cites Josephus, Antiquities 17.11.4 §319 and Jewish War 2.6.3 §96. Hayles 1974: 25–26 posits deteriorating relations between Augustus and Herod as an explanation for the census. The statement by Sherwin-White 1963: 163 n. 4 that such a census in this period is impossible is clearly excessive in light of our partial knowledge of this period.

1 In fact, a Galilean named Judas revolted in a.d. 6 because he did not want to pay such taxes; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.1 §118; Tiede 1988: 344.

19 1QS 5.13; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.2–13 §§119–61. Bringing Josephus's description into consideration assumes that the Qumran community is Essene, a stance defended by Dupont-Sommer 1961: 39–67. Despite recent objections raised because of the find of Miqsāt Maʿăsê Tôrâ (4QMMT) at Qumran, this is still the best option.

14 Fitzmyer 1981: 753–54; Ellis 1974: 137; m. Ber. 9.5 (a command with roots in Exod. 3:5); Schürmann 1969: 501 n. 20; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.4 §§124–27 (about the Essenes). On the contrast with the practice of Greek cynics and philosophers, see Schürmann 1969: 502 n. 24 and Bovon 1989: 458 n. 20, who compares the disciples' absence of possessions with the Levites and their being provided for through the tithe (Num. 18:21).

15 BAGD 473; BAA 960; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.4 §125 (which speaks about how Essene travelers took arms to protect themselves from such robbers) and 2.12.2 §228 (where robbers caused major social unrest). Luke refers to a robber, not a terrorist.

1 For the Pharisee view of resurrection, see Josephus, Jewish War 3.8.5 §374; Against Apion 2.30 §218; Antiquities 18.1.3 §14. For the Essene view, see Jewish War 2.8.11 §154; Antiquities 18.1.5 §18. Cf. SB 1:885–86; 1 Enoch 15.6–9.

23 Josephus, Antiquities 13.5.9 §171; 13.10.6 §§293–98; 17.2.4–3.1 §§41–51; 18.1.2 §11; Jewish War 2.8.14 §§162–63; C. F. Evans 1990: 298–99.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

5 For Pilate, see Josephus, Jewish War 2.9.2–4 §§169–77; and Antiquities 18.3.1 §§55–59. For Herod Antipas, see Jewish War 1.33.8 §§668–69; 2.9.1 §§167–68; Antiquities 17.8.1 §188; 17.11.4 §318; 18.5.2 §§116–19. For Philip, see Antiquities 17.2.2 §§27–28; 17.4.2–3 §§78–80; 17.8.1 §189; 17.11.4 §319.

9 On the building of aqueducts to improve the city’s water supply, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.2 §60; Jewish War 2.9.4 §175; SB 2:197;

Klostermann 1929: 143.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

15 BAGD 473; BAA 960; Josephus, Jewish War 2.8.4 §125 (which speaks about how Essene travelers took arms to protect themselves from such robbers) and 2.12.2 §228 (where robbers caused major social unrest). Luke refers to a robber, not a terrorist.

7 Josephus, Jewish War 2.12.3 §232; Jeremias 1969: 352–58; Jeremias, TDNT 7:88–94. On Jewish attitudes, see Sir. 50:25–26; T. Levi 7.2; Gen. Rab. 81.3 on 35:2; Jub. 30.5–6, 23; C. A. Evans 1990: 164. On the relationship between Jews and Samaritans, see Brindle 1984.

8 Jeremias 1969: 76–77; Josephus, Life 65 §354 (which notes how few Tiberians [two thousand] were in Jerusalem on one key festival occasion); Antiquities 17.9.3 §§213–14; Jewish War 2.14.3 §280; 2.1.3 §§10–12.

31 Josephus, Jewish War 2.14.4 §287 commends a tax collector for trying to solve a dispute, but notes that he had little alternative.

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

18 The earliest extant literary reference to the Sanhedrin is 198 b.c., the date of a letter that Antiochus III the Great wrote after the Battle of Panion; Josephus, Antiquities 12.3.3 §138; Lohse, TDNT 7:862–66; Schürer 1973–87: 2.199–217. Josephus also uses the term βουλή (council) to describe the Sanhedrin (Jewish War 2.15.6 §331; 2.16.2 §336). R. Brown 1994: 340–57 stresses that there is only one such group at this time, the number of members usually being put at seventy-one (m. Sanh. 1.6, drawing on Num. 11:16).

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is 4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

9 BAGD 536; BAA 1085; m. Nid. 5.6; m. Meg. 4.6; m. ›Abot 5.21; Luke 2:42 (a conceptual example of Jesus at twelve); Acts 26:4; 1 Tim. 4:2; also Gen. 48:15; Num. 22:30; Isa. 47:15; 54:6; Jer. 3:25; Josephus, Jewish War 4.1.5 §33. See the exegesis of Luke 2:42.

8 M. Smith 1971 argues for a late origin, but Hengel 1961 argues for ideological unity between the early group and later Zealots, as does M. Stern 1976: 578–79. Much of Josephus's Jewish War 4 condemns this radical group for their activity in A.D.. 66–70; especially descriptive is

4.6.3 §§381–88. Nolland 1989: 271 also prefers a distinction between the Zealot party and Luke's term. Witherington 1990: 81–88, 96–98 supports Hengel. Against this connection is R. Brown 1994: 689–93.

3 BAGD 580; BAA 1175. Luke 1:39, 65 are the only two NT uses. Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.2 §451 has this use.

4 Matt. 20:29 = Mark 10:46; Heb. 11:30; BAGD 372; BAA 756. The new Jericho was given to Cleopatra by Mark Antony and later came under Herod the Great's authority; Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §459, §474; Antiquities 15.4.2–4 §§96–107.

14 Manson 1949: 262 notes both Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §474, who describes the region's barren character, and Jerome, who observes that Arab robbers were frequent on this route in his day some four centuries after Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 593 adds to the list Strabo 16.2.40–41 (c763), who mentions Pompey's problem with robbers and then describes the city.

4 Matt. 20:29 = Mark 10:46; Heb. 11:30; BAGD 372; BAA 756. The new Jericho was given to Cleopatra by Mark Antony and later came under Herod the Great's authority; Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §459, §474; Antiquities 15.4.2–4 §§96–107.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

9 For options, see BAGD 868 §4; BAA 1730; Fitzmyer 1895: 988; and Plummer 1896: 331. Josephus uses both approaches: three watches in Jewish War 5.12.2 §510 and four in Antiquities 18.9.6 §356.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

14 Noting that the fall was fated by God, Josephus, Jewish War 6.4.5 §250, describes the destruction of Jerusalem on the tenth day of Loüs (= 29 August a.d. 70). The temple was first burned (Jewish War 6.4.5 §250) and then razed (Jewish War 7.1.1 §§1–4). Josephus also describes portents of the end; Jewish War 6.5.3–4 §§288–315. The OT describes the first destruction of Jerusalem: Jer. 52:12–13; 7:1–14; 22:5; 27:6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1331.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

3 For other acts of offense against the temple, see m. Sanh. 9.6. On the association of the eschaton, a redeeming figure, and the final renewed temple in Judaism, see Josephus, Antiquities 18.4.1 §§85–87; Jewish War 6.5.2 §§283–85 (1 Enoch 90.28–40 is often cited in this regard, but this passage refers to Yahweh's activity, not Messiah's; Juel 1977: 199–200). E. Sanders 1985: 77–90 traces the new-temple hope in Judaism: Tob. 14:5; 2 Macc. 2:7; 1 Enoch 24–25; 89–90; Jub. 1.15–17; 1QM 2.5–6; 7.10; 4QsPs^{a} [= 4QpPs 37]; 11QTemple^{a} 29.8–10. This hope was widespread, though it was held with a variety of detail.

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

27 For example, the sun turned away from Mark Antony's enemies (Josephus, Antiquities 14.12.3 §309), and many heavenly portents came with the temple's destruction (Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §§288–300).

14 Noting that the fall was fated by God, Josephus, Jewish War 6.4.5 §250, describes the destruction of Jerusalem on the tenth day of Loüs (= 29 August a.d. 70). The temple was first burned (Jewish War 6.4.5 §250) and then razed (Jewish War 7.1.1 §§1–4). Josephus also describes portents of the end; Jewish War 6.5.3–4 §§288–315. The OT describes the first destruction of Jerusalem: Jer. 52:12–13; 7:1–14; 22:5; 27:6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1331.

29 Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §§293–96, notes the mysterious opening of the temple doors at midnight on a Passover (but he doesn't give the year). T. Ben. 9.3 and T. Levi 10.3 refer to a rending of the temple curtain, but these references may be Christian interpolations; see M. De Jonge 1960: 222–26 (repr. pp. 233–37).

4 Fitzmyer 1985: 1474 and Delling, TDNT 6:279, note that twenty-four uses of πλῆθος (company) are in Luke–Acts, with only one in Mark and none in Matthew. The combination ἅπαν (or πᾶν) τὸ πλῆθος (the whole company) is found in Luke 1:10; 8:37; 19:37; Acts 15:12; 25:24; Marshall 1978: 852. The idea of leading Jesus to Pilate shows the use of ἄγω for taking a criminal somewhere (Matt. 10:18; Josephus, Jewish War 6.5.3 §303; BAGD 14 §2; BAA 25 §2).

10 Fitzmyer 1985: 1169 notes how Jewish historian Josephus reacted to eschatological claims; Jewish War 6.5.4 §§310–15 (also Tacitus, Histories 5.13).

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

14 Noting that the fall was fated by God, Josephus, Jewish War 6.4.5 §250, describes the destruction of Jerusalem on the tenth day of Loüs (= 29 August a.d. 70). The temple was first burned (Jewish War 6.4.5 §250) and then razed (Jewish War 7.1.1 §§1–4). Josephus also describes portents of the end; Jewish War 6.5.3–4 §§288–315. The OT describes the first destruction of Jerusalem: Jer. 52:12–13; 7:1–14; 22:5; 27:6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1331.

7 The concept of reception pictures the open welcome to be given to others. On δέξηται (he receives), see Marshall 1978: 396; Grundmann, TDNT 2:51–52. The term refers to friendly reception or hospitality, which was seen as sacred in the ancient world and in Judaism. B. Šab. 127a says, "Hospitality to travelers is greater than the greeting of the Shekinah." Though hyperbolic, the saying shows the importance of hospitality.

Josephus, Jewish War 7.4.1 §63, refers to how Vespasian's reception brought joy and satisfaction.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

28 Josephus, Jewish War 5–7, esp. 6.5.1 §§271–73; 6.9.3 §420; 7.5.3 §118; 7.5.5 §138; 7.5.6 §154. Plummer 1896: 482 thinks that Josephus's numbers are too high. Arndt 1956: 421–22 accepts them, arguing that many people had fled to the city, thus inflating its population. Regardless, it is clear that the city was leveled and much of its population slain. On the suggested population of Jerusalem during feast time, see excursus 11. Current scholarly estimates for feast-day population are 110,000–150,000.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine

(Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

12 Luke 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42; 11:24; Foerster, TDNT 2:16; Hauck, TDNT 3:428. On demons in Judaism, see Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185 ("spirits of wicked men who enter the living and kill them unless aid is forthcoming"); 1 Enoch 19.1; Jub. 10.5; T. Ben. 5.2; C. F. Evans 1990: 279. In the OT, δαιμονίου occurs in Ps. 90:6 [91:6 Engl.] and τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον in Zech. 13:2.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

9 Life 1 §2 and Antiquities 7.14.7 §§363–67 attribute the twenty-four groups to David and allude to 1 Chron. 24:31; see also Against Apion 2.8 §108.

1 On the Jewish use of genealogies, see C. F. Evans 1990: 251–53. Such lists were available to some in the first century. Josephus, Life 1 §§3–6 and Against Apion 1.7 §§30–36 limits such lists to priestly families.

6 Fitzmyer 1981: 380; Klostermann 1929: 23; SB 2:107. Efforts to prove that the grandfather was the most frequent choice, as argue Creed 1930: 24 and Nolland 1989: 79, are not substantiated. Examples of naming after a relative are numerous: after the father: Tob. 1:1, 9; Josephus, Life 1 §5; Jewish War 5.13.2 §534; Antiquities 14.1.3 §10; after a grandfather: 1 Macc. 2:1–2; Jub. 11.15. C. F. Evans 1990: 179, positing Hellenistic assimilation, is entirely too skeptical about the details here.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21;

Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

4 Josephus, Life 5 §21, mentions the position of chief priests. Marshall 1978: 578 notes this reference, but is undecided on what it means.

31 Josephus, Life 9 §42, describes Gadara as located "on the frontiers of Tiberias." Some of its coins include a ship; Marshall 1978: 337.

1 Ellis 1974: 184; Danker 1988: 259; Tiede 1988: 247; Creed 1930: 180. In addition to the Josephean references in the list in the exegesis of 13:1, see also Life 17 §92.

12 Marshall 1978: 127; R. Brown 1977: 474; Jeremias 1969: 58–60; Josephus, Life 52 §269; m. Maʿas. Š. 5.2.

8 Jeremias 1969: 76–77; Josephus, Life 65 §354 (which notes how few Tiberians [two thousand] were in Jerusalem on one key festival occasion); Antiquities 17.9.3 §§213–14; Jewish War 2.14.3 §280; 2.1.3 §§10–12.

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life 65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

6 Bovon 1989: 66–67 (also n. 13) speaks of Isaiah and the development of Jewish speculation like Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Isaac and Moses (Biblical Antiquities 8–9) and Philo's view of Isaac (Cherubim 12–15 §§40–52), though Bovon notes that for Philo this detail was allegorical. One could add Pseudo-Philo's portrait of Samson's birth (Biblical Antiquities 42). None of these accounts are virgin births: they only supply details of the event not in the original accounts. Bovon also argues for Hellenistic influence. C. F. Evans 1990: 156–57 surveys divine paternity in the ancient world, but denies its value for this passage. He prefers to speak of a retrojection, which means he thinks later reflection has produced the tradition.

36 R. Brown 1977: 305 rejects this Jewish evidence, noting that the Qumran community did not have a permanent celibacy but a temporary one for priests offering sacrifices. The texts in Philo are Contemplative Life 8 §68 and Hypothetica 11.14–17.

10 On Sejanus, see R. Brown 1994: 693–94, 1376. His anti-Semitism is recorded by Philo, Embassy to Gaius 24 §§160–61 and Flaccus 1 §1. Brown doubts Philo's account, arguing that he transferred blame from Tiberius to Sejanus for political reasons. But Sejanus carried too much power in a.d. 26–31 to pass responsibility to a largely absentee Tiberius (who was sensitive to Jews, as noted above).

10 On Sejanus, see R. Brown 1994: 693–94, 1376. His anti-Semitism is recorded by Philo, Embassy to Gaius 24 §§160–61 and Flaccus 1 §1. Brown doubts Philo's account, arguing that he transferred blame from Tiberius to Sejanus for political reasons. But Sejanus carried too much power in a.d. 26–31 to pass responsibility to a largely absentee Tiberius (who was sensitive to Jews, as noted above).

14 Jesus' tone differs from the "martyr" parallels in 2 Macc. 5–6 (where the intercession is a declaration of the sufferer's righteousness and faithfulness) and 7:14, 17, 19 (where the condemned promise God's vengeance on the executioner). On the other hand, some Jewish texts appeal to mercy for all, even sinners (Jon. 4:11; T. Ben. 4.2; Philo, Flaccus 2 §7; R. Brown 1994: 974), a merciful attitude that also appears in the church fathers (Ignatius, Ephesians 10.2–3; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.14).

17 This view of the king's sternness is conceptually like Josephus's description of a law that punishes slaves more harshly; Against Apion 2.30 §216; C. Taylor 1901; Plato, Laws 913c (11); Brightman 1927–28; Philo, Hypothetica 7.6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

36 R. Brown 1977: 305 rejects this Jewish evidence, noting that the Qumran community did not have a permanent celibacy but a temporary one for priests offering sacrifices. The texts in Philo are Contemplative Life 8 §68 and Hypothetica 11.14–17.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

15 T. Naph. 3.4–5; 3 Macc. 2:4–5; Wis. 10:4–6; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10–12 §§52–65; Gen. Rab. 27 on 6:5–6; m. Sanh. 10.3; SB 1:574; Marshall 1978: 662; Lührmann 1969: 75–83. In the NT see 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5–7; at Qumran see 1QapGen 6.6.

17 The phrase πῦρ καὶ θεῖον (fire and sulfur) occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Rev. 9:17, 18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8; BAGD 353; BAA 718; Philo, Life of Moses 2.10 §56. It is apocalyptic-judgment language whose concepts reflect the apocalyptic-prophetic teaching of Jesus.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60;

and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

37 Godet 1875: 1.115. Bovon 1989: 108 n. 74 notes that the expression forgiveness of sins is like neither the OT nor the Christian expression. Jewish usage does occur: Philo, Life of Moses 2.29 §147; Special Laws 1.35 §190; Josephus, Antiquities 6.5.6 §92 (which discusses God's reaction to Israel's desire to elect a king in 1 Sam. 12 and the nation's confession of sin after God revealed his displeasure).

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif.

Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

5 For this connection are Ellis 1974: 11 and Schürmann 1969: 313 (who mentions Exod. 24:1–2, 9, 12–13, 15–18, with the seventy elders worshiping from a distance as Moses goes up the mountain, as well as 19:3 and 34:2–5); against it are Marshall 1978: 236 and Fitzmyer 1981: 616. Bovon 1989: 279–80 calls it questionable, citing Philo, Life of Moses 1.40 §§220–26; 2.14–15 §§70–71; 2.28 §§141–42; 2.30 §153; 2.31 §§159–60; and Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 11–12, 15, as lacking such a motif. Bovon prefers to see Jesus praying for the preparation and renewal of his people, as Moses had done and as Pseudo-Philo notes.

17 Philo, On Abraham 21 §105: “Virtue’s nature is most peaceable; she is careful, so they say, to test her own strength before the conflict, so if she is able to contend to the end she will take the field; but if she finds her strength too weak, she may shrink from entering the contest at all.”

17 Παραβιάζομαι usually means “to use force” on someone, but here “quiet persuasion” is meant, which is similar to the use of the unprefixed form in the difficult 16:16. On the importance of hospitality in Judaism, see Philo, On Abraham 22 §§107–13; Josephus, Antiquities 1.11.2 §196.

7 The order of commandments in Matthew and Mark follows the MT and manuscript A of the LXX. Luke’s order finds ancient precedent in Philo, On the Decalogue 12 §51; manuscript B of Deut. 5 LXX; as well as NT parallels in Rom. 13:9 and James 2:11; Nolland 1993a: 886.

37 Godet 1875: 1.115. Bovon 1989: 108 n. 74 notes that the expression forgiveness of sins is like neither the OT nor the Christian expression.

Jewish usage does occur: Philo, Life of Moses 2.29 §147; Special Laws 1.35 §190; Josephus, Antiquities 6.5.6 §92 (which discusses God's reaction to Israel's desire to elect a king in 1 Sam. 12 and the nation's confession of sin after God revealed his displeasure).

31 One could also stand; Philo, Special Laws 2.15 §62; Acts 13:16.

6 Jeremias objects that, if this theory is correct, the time advance is not one day but only four to six hours. He appeals to Jub. 49.10, 19, and Philo, Special Laws 2.27 §145, to argue against an evening sacrifice.

5 Ἔμιξεν (he mixed) comes from either μείγνυμι (BAGD 499) or μίγνυμι (BAA 1055), both meaning "to mix." The expression is an idiom for two events occurring together; so Ellis 1974: 185, who cites Exod. Rab. 19.5 on 12:43–44, SB 2:193, and Blinzler 1957–58: 28–29. The midrash refers to a mixture of circumcision blood and Paschal blood to indicate the need of a person who eats Passover to be circumcised. Philo, Special Laws 3.16 §91, discusses the inappropriateness of mixing the blood of murderers and sacrifices at the temple (Nolland 1993a: 717–18). Wiefel 1988: 252 n. 11 calls the expression "Palestinian."

7 BAGD 462 mentions this meaning, though it does not place Luke 1:22 here; BAA 938. For idols, the emphasis is on their inability to answer, but this is a function of more than being unable to speak. See also Philo, Special Laws 4.38 §197. Sibylline Oracles 4.27–28 also refers to idols.

62 On κωφός signifying deafness and muteness, see 1:62 and Philo, Special Laws 4.38 §§197–98; Marshall 1978: 61; Fitzmyer 1981: 329.

9 Philo, On the Virtues 37 §§204–5, is close in tying Adam's descent to the eternal Father, but Philo sees Adam as unique in this role.

15 Bultmann, TDNT 2:753; Plato, Statesman 311B; Luce 1933: 101; Plummer 1896: 66, who notes that Philo used the term to describe Abraham in Who Is the Heir? 6 §22.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

5 See C. Kim 1975 for an ancient invitation. Fitzmyer 1985: 1055 correctly notes that Jeremias's appeal to this as a custom of Jerusalem has only a fifth-century text as support, but Esther and Philo suggest that the custom is possibly older. Nolland 1993a: 755 adds Terence, Self-Tormentor 169–70, and Apuleius, Metamorphoses (Golden Ass) 3.12, which may suggest that more than Jewish custom is in view here.

6 Theissen 1983: 100 notes Greek parallels in ancient novels. In Greek circles, the rescue involves the appearing of a god; Homer, Hymns 33.12; Aristides, Hymn to Serapis 33. Such rescues are the affairs of divinity. Marshall 1978: 333 notes a parallel to Virgil, Aeneid 4.554–60.

21 Danker 1988: 328 cites a similar remark by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 4.1.19 (1120b): "One's generosity is to be evaluated in terms of one's resources."

17 Plummer cites Socrates' phrase as πάνυ ὀρθῶς; so also Godet 1875: 1.359 and Bovon 1989: 393 n. 53. However, no reference is given in any of these sources. A check of Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, an electronic database containing most of the extant ancient Greek literature, did not surface the phrase in Socrates. This classical comparison should not be made until the texts are revealed. However, the general rhetorical pattern does fit a type of Socratic interrogation; see Daube 1956: 152; Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.18.2.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

19 Danker 1988: 276 notes a similar appeal to Caesar for clemency in Cicero, On Behalf of Quintus Ligarius 30.

59 Democritus, Fragments 60. Danker 1988: 153–54 also notes Diogenes Laertius 1.36; Menander, Fragment 710; Petronius, Satyricon 57; and Persius, Satires 4.23–24.

10 Hoehner 1977: 15. Hoehner also cites (n. 20) a reference from Ulpian in The Digest of Justinian 1.15.4.2 that required property owners to go to the district where they owned land. Issues of ancestry and land may fit here, even though Joseph lived elsewhere.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

6 Hayles 1973: 120; Fitzmyer 1981: 400. On Augustan census activity, see Braunert 1957; Corbishley 1936; Tacitus, Annals 1.11; Dio Cassius 53.30.2.

30 Descent into Hades 11. Other notations from ancient writers include Tacitus, Annals 2.42; and Pliny, Natural History 12.32 §§63–65. Emperors sometimes warned against abuses: Tiberius said, "The sheep are to be shorn, not fleeced"; Dio Cassius 57.10.5; Suetonius, Tiberius 32; Danker 1988: 88.

5 Delling, TDNT 8:32–33, esp. n. 3, makes it clear that a censure of the predecessors is not in view. He cites the first-century B.C.. historian Diodorus Siculus 1.1.1–3 as a parallel. To this Conzelmann, TDNT 9:596, adds from the same work 1.2.7 and 1.4.4–5.

5 Delling, TDNT 8:32–33, esp. n. 3, makes it clear that a censure of the predecessors is not in view. He cites the first-century B.C.. historian Diodorus Siculus 1.1.1–3 as a parallel. To this Conzelmann, TDNT 9:596, adds from the same work 1.2.7 and 1.4.4–5.

5 Delling, TDNT 8:32–33, esp. n. 3, makes it clear that a censure of the predecessors is not in view. He cites the first-century B.C.. historian Diodorus Siculus 1.1.1–3 as a parallel. To this Conzelmann, TDNT 9:596, adds from the same work 1.2.7 and 1.4.4–5.

59 Democritus, Fragments 60. Danker 1988: 153–54 also notes Diogenes Laertius 1.36; Menander, Fragment 710; Petronius, Satyricon 57; and Persius, Satires 4.23–24.

4 Danker 1988: 205 cites the following exchange from Diogenes Laertius 1.36: when the philosopher Thales was asked if one could hide an evil deed from God, he answered, “No, not even the thought.”

7 Danker 1988: 355–56 cites Diogenes Laertius 3.19 and 9.115 for occasions where the accused is silent. See also Wis. 8:12; Ignatius, Ephesians 15.1 and Magnesians 8.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 15.7.5 §235 (R. Brown 1994: 772).

11 Grundmann 1963: 263 notes the contrast of Jesus’ position to the Stoics, who tried to live without possessions and who tried to have no need of other people, so they could be “like the gods”; Diogenes Laertius 6.104.

Danker 1988: 253 notes that monastic withdrawal is not the answer either, since Jesus assumes compassionate engagement with people.

7 Danker 1988: 355–56 cites Diogenes Laertius 3.19 and 9.115 for occasions where the accused is silent. See also Wis. 8:12; Ignatius, Ephesians 15.1 and Magnesians 8.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 15.7.5 §235 (R. Brown 1994: 772).

5 Ernst 1977: 155 speaks of a theological, not a biographical, reason for the number. Schürmann 1969: 199 nn. 76, 79 sees only the Davidic reference as key and does not deny a historical value to the number. In the Greco-Roman world, men were called to public service at thirty; Dionysius Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 4.6; C. F. Evans 1990: 254.

8 Josephus, Antiquities 10.5.2 §83 (of Jehoiakim); Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 10.10.7; Livy 22.3.4. Ἐντρέπω is used in Luke 20:13 = Matt. 21:37 = Mark 12:6 to describe the respect that the master's son should get; elsewhere in the NT at 1 Cor. 4:14; 2 Thess. 3:14; Titus 2:8; Heb. 12:9; BAGD 269 §2b; BAA 544 §2b. On not fearing God, see Deut. 25:18 (of the Amalekites).

15 In Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 5.14, Isaiah quietly endures being sawed in two. Other ancients quietly accepting death are Socrates (Plato, Apology 39c) and Stoic philosophers (Epictetus 1.19.8); see Daube 1961: 61–65.

52 Danker 1988: 150 cites Epictetus 2.14.12–13 to show how the Greeks viewed imitation of the gods: "It is of prime importance for those who would please and obey the deities to be as much like them as lies within their power. If fidelity is a divine characteristic, then they are to be faithful;

if generous, they are to be generous; if beneficent, they are to be beneficent; if magnanimous, they are to be magnanimous. In brief, they are to do and say everything in emulation of God." Christianity also has this goal in the context of monotheism, but in addition offers enablement to make it happen (John 14–16).

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

5 Epictetus 3.3.5 speaks of choosing good over one's father and, as a result, having nothing to do with the father. Jesus' image is similar. If what God requires is greater than what the family desires, God comes first.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

38 Euripides, Fragments 1086, 1071; Oepke, TDNT 3:205; Creed 1930: 68; Marshall 1978: 187; Cicero, Letters to His Friends 4.5.5; Gen. Rab. 23.4 on 4:23; SB 2:156; P. Oxy. vol. 1 #1 logion 6; Gospel of Thomas 31; Nolland 1979. On ἰατρός, see BAGD 369 §1; BAA 750.

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: "One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, 'I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!' he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies." 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: "Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, 'We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.' / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse" (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

23 On πυρετός, see BAGD 730–31; BAA 1462; Van Der Loos 1965: 553; K. Weiss, TDNT 6:956–59; Galen, De Differentiis Febrium 1.1; SB

1:479; Hobart 1882: 3–5.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

16 Plummer 1896: 219 notes that figures as large as three-hundredfold are given for grain in Babylon; Herodotus 1.193.

23 This and Matt. 24:51 are the only two NT uses; in the LXX the word is used in Exod. 29:17. Similar imagery is found in 1 Sam. 15:33; Amos

1:3; and Sus. 55, 59. In the ancient world, see Homer, Odyssey 18.339; Herodotus 2.139. Kistemaker 1980: 125 notes that the contemporary expression “to skin alive” is parallel. 2 Sam. 12:31 and 1 Chron. 20:3 show other ways that slaves were made to labor as a result of being captured in war. This treatment is as severe as it gets.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

48 Marshall 1978: 262; Van Unnik 1966: 289–95; 1 Macc. 11:33; Sir. 12:1–6; t. Meg. 3.16 (= Neusner 1977–86: 2.292); Epictetus 2.14.18; Hesiod, Works and Days 352; Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander 1446.

6 Theissen 1983: 100 notes Greek parallels in ancient novels. In Greek circles, the rescue involves the appearing of a god; Homer, Hymns 33.12; Aristides, Hymn to Serapis 33. Such rescues are the affairs of divinity. Marshall 1978: 333 notes a parallel to Virgil, Aeneid 4.554–60.

44 Homer's Odyssey 5.188–89 is sometimes mentioned as a parallel, but it is not nearly as close as the texts cited here.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as "legendary." He suggests a cure by "auto-suggestion," a rationalistic description that rejects the account's portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of "grace" as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

23 This and Matt. 24:51 are the only two NT uses; in the LXX the word is used in Exod. 29:17. Similar imagery is found in 1 Sam. 15:33; Amos 1:3; and Sus. 55, 59. In the ancient world, see Homer, Odyssey 18.339; Herodotus 2.139. Kistemaker 1980: 125 notes that the contemporary expression “to skin alive” is parallel. 2 Sam. 12:31 and 1 Chron. 20:3 show other ways that slaves were made to labor as a result of being captured in war. This treatment is as severe as it gets.

8 Josephus, Antiquities 10.5.2 §83 (of Jehoiakim); Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 10.10.7; Livy 22.3.4. Ἐντρέπω is used in Luke 20:13 = Matt. 21:37 = Mark 12:6 to describe the respect that the master’s son should get; elsewhere in the NT at 1 Cor. 4:14; 2 Thess. 3:14; Titus 2:8; Heb. 12:9; BAGD 269 §2b; BAA 544 §2b. On not fearing God, see Deut. 25:18 (of the Amalekites).

30 Fitzmyer 1985: 1134 notes Greek parallels of the dead returning to speak to those on earth: Lucian, Demonax 43; Plato, Republic 614d (10.13).

14 Rengstorf, TDNT 8:543; also Michaelis, TDNT 5:348, 373. Luke will call these men “witnesses” later in Luke–Acts (Luke 24:44–48; Acts 1:8). Such eyewitnesses were important to ancient historians: Thucydides 1.22.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §55; and Lucian’s parody in How to Write History 4. See Du Plessis 1974: 265.

2 These are often unpolished materials; see Lucian, How to Write History 47–48.

11 Van Unnik 1979: 40–42, esp. n. 23, cites Lucian’s use of ἀνατάσσομαι in How to Write History 47–48. See also Van Unnik 1973. It should be said, however, that when used in a prologue and tied to a word like ἐπιχειρέω, ἀνατάσσομαι suggests written or at least well-organized reports. Also in favor of written predecessors is Du Plessis 1974: 262–63. Written sources are still the most likely referent here. My point is that we cannot be sure that Luke did not mean more than that, especially since multiple sources are mentioned.

31 Creed 1930: 63 cites Acts of Peter 32 and Lucian, Lover of Lies 13, while Fitzmyer 1981: 511 notes Josephus's description of Theudas in Antiquities 20.5.1 §§97–98.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine

(Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

32 P. Tebt. vol. 1 #43 lines 26, 36; P. Oxy. vol. 3 #472 line 33 (A.D.. 130). BAGD 776 cites Lysias 26.24 (177) as well as Luke 19:8, though it interprets the term in Luke 3:14 as "harass, accuse falsely."

11 Fitzmyer 1985: 973; Marshall 1978: 524; Klostermann 1929: 136; Wiefel 1988: 237. Parallels for this concept are common; see 1 Cor. 15:32; Eccles. 8:15; Isa. 22:13; Tob. 7:10. Two other Jewish texts are especially relevant: Sir. 11:18–19 (NRSV) reads: "One becomes rich through diligence and self-denial, / and the reward allotted to him is this: / when he says, 'I have found rest, / and now I shall feast on my goods!' he does not know how long it will be/ until he leaves them to others and dies." 1 Enoch 97.8–10 reads: "Woe unto you who gain silver and gold by unjust means; / you will then say, 'We have grown rich and accumulated goods, / we have acquired everything that we have desired. / So now let us do whatever we like; / for we have gathered silver, / we have filled our treasuries [with money] like water. / And many are the laborers in our houses.' / Your lies flow like water. / For your wealth shall not endure / but it shall take off from you quickly / for you have acquired it all unjustly, / and you shall be given over to a great curse" (translation by E. Isaac in J. Charlesworth 1983–85: 1.78). For Hellenistic parallels, see Euripides, Alcestis 788–89; Menander, Fragment 301.

59 Democritus, Fragments 60. Danker 1988: 153–54 also notes Diogenes Laertius 1.36; Menander, Fragment 710; Petronius, Satyricon 57; and Persius, Satires 4.23–24.

59 Democritus, Fragments 60. Danker 1988: 153–54 also notes Diogenes Laertius 1.36; Menander, Fragment 710; Petronius, Satyricon 57; and Persius, Satires 4.23–24.

59 Democritus, Fragments 60. Danker 1988: 153–54 also notes Diogenes Laertius 1.36; Menander, Fragment 710; Petronius, Satyricon 57; and Persius, Satires 4.23–24.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

10 Nolland 1989: 204 notes that in the ancient world exorcism falls between magic (Paris Magic Papyrus, lines 3007–85) and medicine (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.20; Josephus, Jewish War 7.6.3 §185). Jews and non-Jews believed in magic (Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49; Lucian, Lover of Lies 16, 30–31). But these healings often included potions or other aids that Jesus does not use. The healer in Lucian's account, a Syrian from Palestine, charged a large fee for the service. Lucian also notes the exorcist's use of "Egyptian works" and "imprecations in the Egyptian language." Surveying recent work on the question, Crossan 1991: 304–10 compares magic, miracle, and medicine and equates miracle to magic. But this grossly underestimates Jesus. The range of Jesus' miracles suggests the presence of power far beyond anything magical. Jesus does not rely on potions or aids, but uses only his word. The Jesus Seminar (Funk and Hoover 1993: 42) argues that because Jesus did not use magical formulas or incantations, the disciples did not preserve his actual words for the exorcism. But the logic of this argument for a lack of remembrance is not clear or compelling. The very dissimilarity of Jesus' style compared to other such events in the ancient world might make what he did say memorable.

14 His phrase ἐσχάτως ἔχει equals our slang term "has reached the end." Schürmann 1969: 490 n. 133 notes the idiom in Phrynichus, Eclogues 389 (which should be corrected to §368). Mark also notes that Jairus asked Jesus to lay hands on the girl, a point also found in Matt. 9:18. Mark and Matthew cite the request, while Luke only summarizes it.

15 In Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah 5.14, Isaiah quietly endures being sawed in two. Other ancients quietly accepting death are Socrates (Plato, Apology 39c) and Stoic philosophers (Epictetus 1.19.8); see Daube 1961: 61–65.

17 This view of the king's sternness is conceptually like Josephus's description of a law that punishes slaves more harshly; Against Apion 2.30 §216; C. Taylor 1901; Plato, Laws 913c (11); Brightman 1927–28; Philo, Hypothetica 7.6; Fitzmyer 1985: 1237.

13 Stählin, TDNT 9:160, also n. 117, exaggerates the ancient debate: some ancients (Plato, Phaerdus 233d–34a) said to invite only family and friends, while m. ›Abot 1.5 said to leave the door wide open (but for reasons of exclusion noted above). B. Scott 1989: 164 calls Jesus' instruction the "law of no return."

11 Seed as a metaphor for the word is common in the ancient world; Bovon 1989: 407 n. 25; Pseudo-Plutarch, Liberal Education 4 (2B); Plato, Phaedrus 276B–77A; Klauck 1978: 192–96. Ὁ σπείρων is generic in force and should be translated "a sower"; Arndt 1956: 229. Σπεῖραι is an infinitive of purpose: he went out "to sow his seed." On the generic article, see BDF §252 and BDR §252b.

30 Fitzmyer 1985: 1134 notes Greek parallels of the dead returning to speak to those on earth: Lucian, Demonax 43; Plato, Republic 614d (10.13).

15 Bultmann, TDNT 2:753; Plato, Statesman 311B; Luce 1933: 101; Plummer 1896: 66, who notes that Philo used the term to describe Abraham

in Who Is the Heir? 6 §22.

5 On crucifixion and the activity associated with it, see Hengel 1977. The Roman practice of scourging (verberatio) preceded the execution of capital criminals, who were lashed until blood was drawn; Plautus, Bacchides 823; Suetonius, Claudius 34; and Suetonius, Domitian 11.

30 Descent into Hades 11. Other notations from ancient writers include Tacitus, Annals 2.42; and Pliny, Natural History 12.32 §§63–65. Emperors sometimes warned against abuses: Tiberius said, “The sheep are to be shorn, not fleeced”; Dio Cassius 57.10.5; Suetonius, Tiberius 32; Danker 1988: 88.

13 Deut. 22:9; Judg. 9:7–15; 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; 2 Kings 18:31; SB 1:872–73 §g; Marshall 1978: 555. On fig trees and vineyards, see Pliny, Natural History 17.35 §200 and Nolland 1993a: 718. Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum 3.10.6, advises against mixing figs and vines.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9. To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke’s account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

10 B. Scott 1989: 135–36, esp. n. 26, compares this attitude to the Epicurean philosophy reflected in the inscription on Sardanapalus's tomb (recorded by Plutarch, Moralia 336c ["On the Fortune of Alexander" 2.3]): "Eat, drink, and sport with love; all else is nothing."

13 Stählin (TDNT 8:264–65) speaks of a game like "blind man's bluff." R. Brown 1994: 575 discusses three games involving covered or blindfolded eyes listed by Pollux, Onomasticon 9.113, 123, 129 (second century b.c.).

13 Stählin (TDNT 8:264–65) speaks of a game like "blind man's bluff." R. Brown 1994: 575 discusses three games involving covered or blindfolded eyes listed by Pollux, Onomasticon 9.113, 123, 129 (second century b.c.).

13 Stählin (TDNT 8:264–65) speaks of a game like "blind man's bluff." R. Brown 1994: 575 discusses three games involving covered or blindfolded eyes listed by Pollux, Onomasticon 9.113, 123, 129 (second century b.c.).

21 So most take it, including Fitzmyer 1981: 297; Creed 1930: 4–5; Ellis 1974: 66; Schweizer 1984: 12; Marshall 1978: 43; and Kittel, TDNT 1:215–16, who cites Polybius 3.32.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §53 and Life 65 §357. Cadbury 1922a: 501–2 challenges the first two examples directly. This view is present in NIV, NASB, Neu Luther, and Einheitsübersetzung. NKJV and KJV speak of having a "perfect understanding," the most emphatic of all translations, which is really a separate view.

10 For more on διήγησις as meaning oral and written accounts, see the introduction to §I.A above and TDNT 2:909, where Büchsel provides a nice summary of usage. One parallel to note is Polybius 5.31.4.

21 Danker 1988: 314 notes a "prophecy" by Demetrius of Phalerum, who predicted the Macedonian victory with similar political sensitivity (Polybius 29.21).

11 Seed as a metaphor for the word is common in the ancient world; Bovon 1989: 407 n. 25; Pseudo-Plutarch, Liberal Education 4 (2B); Plato, Phaedrus 276B–77A; Klauck 1978: 192–96. Ὁ σπείρων is generic in force and should be translated "a sower"; Arndt 1956: 229. Σπεῖραι is an infinitive of purpose: he went out "to sow his seed." On the generic article, see BDF §252 and BDR §252b.

6 So Arndt 1956: 254 argues for two Bethsaidas; otherwise Fitzmyer 1981: 765–66; Godet 1875: 1.404–5 (who sees many places with this name along the lake, since the name is a generic description); Ptolemy, Geography 5.16.4. Cf. Josephus's use of "Gaulanite" in Antiquities 18.1.1 §4 and "Galilean" in 18.1.6 §23. A region is addressed, not just a populated locale, as the dilemma about food makes clear. Bethsaida may be nothing more than temporary "headquarters" for mission in the region. Arndt and Godet may be right about the Marcan reference being a distinct locale using a generic name. John 12:21 may confirm the distinction.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

20 Procksch, TDNT 4:328 n. 3; Creed 1930: 41. Bovon 1989: 143 n. 35 adds Sophocles, Antigone 1268, 1314.

20 Procksch, TDNT 4:328 n. 3; Creed 1930: 41. Bovon 1989: 143 n. 35 adds Sophocles, Antigone 1268, 1314.

13 References to Quirinius are found in Tacitus, Annals 2.30; 3.22–23, 48; and Strabo 12.6.5 (C 569); Luce 1933: 95–96; Fitzmyer 1981: 402; R. Brown 1977: 395.

14 Manson 1949: 262 notes both Josephus, Jewish War 4.8.3 §474, who describes the region’s barren character, and Jerome, who observes that Arab robbers were frequent on this route in his day some four centuries after Jesus. Nolland 1993a: 593 adds to the list Strabo 16.2.40–41 (c763), who mentions Pompey’s problem with robbers and then describes the city.

6 Creed 1930: 44 and Nolland 1989: 129 have typical lists of examples: Cyrus (at ten) in Herodotus 1.114–15; Alexander the Great in Plutarch, Life of Alexander 5 (666–67); Apollonius in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.7; Moses in Josephus, Antiquities 2.9.6 §230, and in Philo, Life of Moses §21; Samuel (at twelve) in Josephus, Antiquities 5.10.4 §348; Solomon (at twelve) in 1 Kings 2:12 LXX; and Josephus (of himself!) in Life 2 §§8–9.

To this can be added the account of Augustus in Suetonius, Augustus 94, as Klostermann 1929: 45 notes. Luke's account of Jesus is restrained in comparison to most of these accounts.

19 Such notations by the state are common: Josephus, Antiquities 15.8.1 §272 (inscriptions that commemorate Caesar and present trophies of war); Suetonius, Caligula 32.2; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.1.44. In these other texts, the inscription is borne by the criminal or by someone in front of the cross (Nolland 1993b: 1148). Pilate's inscription stands behind the initials INRI seen in many famous paintings of this scene. INRI is an acronym for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), wording that parallels John's Gospel.

5 On crucifixion and the activity associated with it, see Hengel 1977. The Roman practice of scourging (verberatio) preceded the execution of capital criminals, who were lashed until blood was drawn; Plautus, Bacchides 823; Suetonius, Claudius 34; and Suetonius, Domitian 11.

5 On crucifixion and the activity associated with it, see Hengel 1977. The Roman practice of scourging (verberatio) preceded the execution of capital criminals, who were lashed until blood was drawn; Plautus, Bacchides 823; Suetonius, Claudius 34; and Suetonius, Domitian 11.

2 Hoehner 1977: 32 nn. 12–13, who cites Appian, Civil Wars 2.149; Plutarch, Life of Caesar 62–67 (737–40); Suetonius, Julius Caesar 81.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 18.2.2 §32; 18.6.10 §224; Jewish War 2.9.1 §168; 2.9.5 §180.

30 Descent into Hades 11. Other notations from ancient writers include Tacitus, Annals 2.42; and Pliny, Natural History 12.32 §§63–65. Emperors sometimes warned against abuses: Tiberius said, “The sheep are to be shorn, not fleeced”; Dio Cassius 57.10.5; Suetonius, Tiberius 32; Danker 1988: 88.

6 Hayles 1973: 120; Fitzmyer 1981: 400. On Augustan census activity, see Braunert 1957; Corbishley 1936; Tacitus, Annals 1.11; Dio Cassius 53.30.2.

13 References to Quirinius are found in Tacitus, Annals 2.30; 3.22–23, 48; and Strabo 12.6.5 (C 569); Luce 1933: 95–96; Fitzmyer 1981: 402; R. Brown 1977: 395.

30 Descent into Hades 11. Other notations from ancient writers include Tacitus, Annals 2.42; and Pliny, Natural History 12.32 §§63–65. Emperors sometimes warned against abuses: Tiberius said, “The sheep are to be shorn, not fleeced”; Dio Cassius 57.10.5; Suetonius, Tiberius 32; Danker 1988: 88.

12 Hoehner 1977: 16 cites examples in Syria, Cappadocia, and Nabatea. Tacitus, Annals 2.42 and 6.41, discusses Cappadocia, where taxes were reduced by about half.

13 References to Quirinius are found in Tacitus, Annals 2.30; 3.22–23, 48; and Strabo 12.6.5 (C 569); Luce 1933: 95–96; Fitzmyer 1981: 402; R. Brown 1977: 395.

13 References to Quirinius are found in Tacitus, Annals 2.30; 3.22–23, 48; and Strabo 12.6.5 (C 569); Luce 1933: 95–96; Fitzmyer 1981: 402; R. Brown 1977: 395.

12 Hoehner 1977: 16 cites examples in Syria, Cappadocia, and Nabatea. Tacitus, Annals 2.42 and 6.41, discusses Cappadocia, where taxes were reduced by about half.

6 Sherwin-White 1963: 12 n. 4. Tacitus, Annals 12.60, is the ancient source that discusses the key terminology.

3 Reicke 1968: 228–34. On these distinctions, see Sherwin-White 1963: 1–23 (who cites a variety of relevant ancient texts); C. F. Evans 1990: 233; Tacitus, Annals 15.25.

3 On Pilate, see the exegesis of 3:1. Tacitus, Annals 15.44, mentions Pilate's eventual decision; Fitzmyer 1985: 1474. Kinman 1991 considers the setting to be the assize of the Roman governor; Pilate's presence fits this custom. R. Brown 1994: 363–72 has a detailed discussion of the issue of capital punishment, noting that Jews had no authority to execute, except perhaps those who entered prohibited sections of the temple or committed adultery (John 7:53–8:11; m. Sanh. 7.2). John 18:13 thus fits the legal situation of Jesus' time. On Pilate's career in current literature, see R. Brown 1994: 694–705.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

10 Fitzmyer 1985: 1169 notes how Jewish historian Josephus reacted to eschatological claims; Jewish War 6.5.4 §§310–15 (also Tacitus, Histories 5.13).

22 Josephus records that when the temple burned, a bright star resembling a sword stood over the city and that comets were visible for a year; Jewish War 6.5.1–3 §§274–89, esp. §§288–89; Manson 1949: 326; Fitzmyer 1985: 1337; Plummer 1896: 479. Note also Tacitus, History 5.13; 2 Macc. 5:2–3; Nolland 1993b: 992.

5 See C. Kim 1975 for an ancient invitation. Fitzmyer 1985: 1055 correctly notes that Jeremias's appeal to this as a custom of Jerusalem has only a fifth-century text as support, but Esther and Philo suggest that the custom is possibly older. Nolland 1993a: 755 adds Terence, Self-Tormentor 169–70, and Apuleius, Metamorphoses (Golden Ass) 3.12, which may suggest that more than Jewish custom is in view here.

33 This is the polite form of address; see BDF §60.2. However, that Theophilus is of high rank is not guaranteed; see Bovon 1989: 39 n. 64. See Theophrastus, Characters 5, who says that the address is "simple flattering speech." Nonetheless, Luke's usage does strongly lean toward a greeting of respect.

3 Manson 1949: 278 notes a passage in Theophrastus, Characters 21.2, where the sign of a proud man is that he seeks the seat beside the host. Lev. Rab. 1.5 on 1:1 (commenting on Prov. 25:7) has a similar exhortation for people to stay two or three seats down; see also Josephus, Antiquities 15.2.4 §21.

13 Deut. 22:9; Judg. 9:7–15; 1 Kings 4:25 [5:5 MT]; 2 Kings 18:31; SB 1:872–73 §g; Marshall 1978: 555. On fig trees and vineyards, see Pliny, Natural History 17.35 §200 and Nolland 1993a: 718. Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum 3.10.6, advises against mixing figs and vines.

14 Rengstorf, TDNT 8:543; also Michaelis, TDNT 5:348, 373. Luke will call these men "witnesses" later in Luke–Acts (Luke 24:44–48; Acts 1:8). Such eyewitnesses were important to ancient historians: Thucydides 1.22.2; Josephus, Against Apion 1.10 §55; and Lucian's parody in How to Write History 4. See Du Plessis 1974: 265.

37 Fitzmyer 1985: 1518 notes, however, that Thucydides 2.28 records an eclipse at new moon.

12 The unprefixed form of the verb is used in Acts 28:4 and Gal. 3:13; BDR §93.3.5. Virgil uses the idiom for Dido's hanging on Aeneas's lips; Aeneid 4.79.

6 Theissen 1983: 100 notes Greek parallels in ancient novels. In Greek circles, the rescue involves the appearing of a god; Homer, Hymns 33.12; Aristides, Hymn to Serapis 33. Such rescues are the affairs of divinity. Marshall 1978: 333 notes a parallel to Virgil, Aeneid 4.554–60.

23 Ἄφαντος is used in 2 Macc. 3:34 of angels and in Greco-Roman literature of disappearing gods: Euripides, Orestes 1496; Euripides, Helen 605–6; Virgil, Aeneid 9.656–58; Creed 1930: 297; Marshall 1978: 898; Danker 1988: 394; Klostermann 1929: 238; Grundmann 1963: 447. On departures of transcendent or transported figures, see Luke 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; Acts 10:7; 12:10; and esp. 8:39; Nolland 1993b: 1206.

53 Laurentin 1957a: 176–88 (this discussion is only in the French edition). The view is first attested in Gregory of Nyssa in A.D.. 386; PG 46:1140D–41A; R. Brown 1977: 304; and Delling, TDNT 5:834–35, esp. n. 55, who prefers to speak of a "virgin conception" as the most accurate way to describe Luke's portrayal. Wiefel 1988: 53 refers to Ambrose, Expositio Evangelii Secundam Lucam 2 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 32:99), and Augustine, De Sancta Virginitate 4 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 41:327). For the full history of exegesis, see Graystone 1968: 3–36.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen's seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

14 Many commentators note that Augustine's interpretation (Contra Gaudentium Donatistarum Episcopum Libri II 1.25 §28 [Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 53.226–27]), which sought to compel pagans to enter the faith, badly misreads the imagery. Fitzmyer 1985: 1057 notes that this interpretation made Augustine the spiritual father of the Inquisition.

53 Laurentin 1957a: 176–88 (this discussion is only in the French edition). The view is first attested in Gregory of Nyssa in A.D.. 386; PG 46:1140D–41A; R. Brown 1977: 304; and Delling, TDNT 5:834–35, esp. n. 55, who prefers to speak of a "virgin conception" as the most accurate way to describe Luke's portrayal. Wiefel 1988: 53 refers to Ambrose, Expositio Evangelii Secundam Lucam 2 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 32:99), and Augustine, De Sancta Virginitate 4 (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 41:327). For the full history of exegesis, see Graystone 1968: 3–36.

20 Matt. 19:30 = Mark 10:31 applies the phrase to the powerful and wealthy, while Matt. 20:16 deals with the taking of the kingdom from the vineyard keepers in order to give it to another, a point similar to Luke's. Similar conceptual references are found in Barn. 6.13 and the Gospel of Thomas 4.

63 On these plants and the various fruits, see Marshall 1978: 273; Barn. 7.11; Matt. 7:16; Mark 11:13; 12:26; Luke 20:37; Acts 7:30, 35; James 3:12; Rev. 14:18.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

4 The Gospel of Peter 9.35–10.42 (Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.224–25) gives details about the resurrection, an expansion that demonstrates the differences between canonical and noncanonical accounts and indicates what happened to the tradition in the postapostolic period; cf. also Barn. 15.9. The glorified body is not a mere return to the former earthly existence (i.e., like the resurrection of Lazarus), but represents a transcendent form of real existence (1 Cor. 15:35–49, esp. 15:42–44). On the resurrection as event, see Stein 1977 and Craig 1980.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

19 Godet 1875: 2.64 notes that W. M. L. de Wette and H. A. W. Meyer held this view in the nineteenth century. Shirock 1992 now ably defends this view, noting that it was the view of Chrysostom, Homilies on Matthew 41 (on Matt. 12:25–26). He gives six reasons for the view, the most compelling of which I note on p. 1078. If this view is correct, a major reason for separating 11:19 from 11:20 in the original tradition—namely, the difference in meaning of “you” in each verse—disappears. Evidence of the presence God's kingdom is seen in Jesus and his followers. If this is the argument, Jesus is noting evidence of God's grace in Israel!

1 The delay of the return is mentioned in Luke 12:45–46; 2 Pet. 3:4–9; 1 Clem. 23.3; 24.1; 2 Clem. 11. Jews also had this problem in longing for Messiah's coming; Blomberg 1990: 272.

1 The delay of the return is mentioned in Luke 12:45–46; 2 Pet. 3:4–9; 1 Clem. 23.3; 24.1; 2 Clem. 11. Jews also had this problem in longing for Messiah's coming; Blomberg 1990: 272.

26 As in Gen. 50:24–25; Exod. 3:7, 16; Job 10:12; 29:4; Wis. 2:20; 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:12; and 1 Clem. 50.3; correctly Marshall 1978: 719. Fitzmyer 1985: 1259 does not specify which view he holds.

22 Torment in both the intermediate state and the resurrection is found in Jewish (1 Enoch 22) and early Christian texts (2 Clem. 10.4; 17.7). In the 2 Clement texts the torture of hell is presented quite vividly as physical suffering.

1 The delay of the return is mentioned in Luke 12:45–46; 2 Pet. 3:4–9; 1 Clem. 23.3; 24.1; 2 Clem. 11. Jews also had this problem in longing for Messiah's coming; Blomberg 1990: 272.

22 Torment in both the intermediate state and the resurrection is found in Jewish (1 Enoch 22) and early Christian texts (2 Clem. 10.4; 17.7). In the 2 Clement texts the torture of hell is presented quite vividly as physical suffering.

4 Plummer 1896: 266 argues correctly that efforts to identify this man as Philip or Thomas are speculative and cannot be confirmed, though the identification dates back to Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 3.4.522.

7 See Bovon 1989: 310 for a slightly different breakdown and with additional comparisons to Didache 1.3–5 and Justin Martyr's Apology 1.15.9–10; 1.14.3; 1.16.1.

12 Tertullian, On Modesty 11, identifies the woman in Luke 7:36–50 with the one in Matt. 26:6–13. Gregory the Great identifies the sinful woman with Mary Magdalene (Zahn 1920: 330–32 n. 33 lists the ancient texts). Ephraem the Syrian (On the Sinful Woman; On Our Lord 47) equates Magdalene, Mary of Bethany, and the woman of Luke 7—taking the error one step further.

12 Tertullian, On Modesty 11, identifies the woman in Luke 7:36–50 with the one in Matt. 26:6–13. Gregory the Great identifies the sinful woman with Mary Magdalene (Zahn 1920: 330–32 n. 33 lists the ancient texts). Ephraem the Syrian (On the Sinful Woman; On Our Lord 47) equates Magdalene, Mary of Bethany, and the woman of Luke 7—taking the error one step further.

7 A marginal note in codex V takes this identification from Epiphanius, Panarion 23.6, and says that Cleopas was Jesus' cousin and the second bishop of Jerusalem.

11 Gospel of the Ebionites in Epiphanius, Panarion 30.13.7–8; Gospel of the Hebrews in Jerome, Commentary on Isaiah §4 (on Isa. 11:2); Gospel of the Nazareans in Jerome, Against the Pelagians 3.2; Funk 1985: 1.316; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.169, 177, 160.

3 Hendriksen 1978: 198 n. 166. In relation to the accuracy of Tertullian, who in Against Marcion 1.15 argued that Jesus appeared in the twelfth year of Tiberius (ca. A.D.. 26–27), Eusebius in Chronicon 2 notes that Jesus suffered in the nineteenth year of Tiberius (A.D.. 33), so that the church fathers do not agree on the dates of Jesus' ministry either, since Jesus did not minister for seven years. Jesus' appearing is probably a reference to his baptism by John.

10 Plummer 1896: 271 notes that early church historians attempted to name some of the seventy-two. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 1.12, mentions Barnabas, Sosthenes, Matthias, Joseph Barsabbas, and Thaddaeus. But the tradition is problematic, since it also includes the Cephas of Gal. 2:11—as distinct from the apostle Peter! Even though some later fathers (beginning with Clement of Alexandria) argue that a different Cephas was in view in Galatians, the Cephas of Galatians must be Peter, since he is called a "pillar." It may be that the fathers wanted to spare Peter the criticism that he received from Paul, since they found it hard to believe that he erred so publicly.

19 Such notations by the state are common: Josephus, Antiquities 15.8.1 §272 (inscriptions that commemorate Caesar and present trophies of war); Suetonius, Caligula 32.2; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.1.44. In these other texts, the inscription is borne by the criminal or by someone in front of the cross (Nolland 1993b: 1148). Pilate's inscription stands behind the initials INRI seen in many famous paintings of this scene. INRI is an acronym for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), wording that parallels John's Gospel.

14 Jesus' tone differs from the "martyr" parallels in 2 Macc. 5–6 (where the intercession is a declaration of the sufferer's righteousness and faithfulness) and 7:14, 17, 19 (where the condemned promise God's vengeance on the executioner). On the other hand, some Jewish texts appeal to mercy for all, even sinners (Jon. 4:11; T. Ben. 4.2; Philo, Flaccus 2 §7; R. Brown 1994: 974), a merciful attitude that also appears in the church fathers (Ignatius, Ephesians 10.2–3; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.14).

7 Danker 1988: 355–56 cites Diogenes Laertius 3.19 and 9.115 for occasions where the accused is silent. See also Wis. 8:12; Ignatius, Ephesians 15.1 and Magnesians 8.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 15.7.5 §235 (R. Brown 1994: 772).

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

7 Danker 1988: 355–56 cites Diogenes Laertius 3.19 and 9.115 for occasions where the accused is silent. See also Wis. 8:12; Ignatius, Ephesians 15.1 and Magnesians 8.2; and Josephus, Antiquities 15.7.5 §235 (R. Brown 1994: 772).

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

9 Ψηλαφάω occurs elsewhere in the NT only at Acts 17:27; Heb. 12:18; 1 John 1:1 (BAGD 892; BAA 1779–80); cf. Gen. 27:12; Judg. 16:26; Ignatius, Smyrneans 3.2. Plummer 1896: 560 wonders if 1 John 1:1 knows of this event, given its use of this rare term. See also C. F. Evans 1970: 108–9.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen's seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen's seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

1 The term passion is a wordplay on Hebrew פֶּסַח (Pesaḥ., Passover) and Greek πάσχω (paschō, to suffer); Fitzmyer 1985: 1369; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.10.1.

11 Gospel of the Ebionites in Epiphanius, Panarion 30.13.7–8; Gospel of the Hebrews in Jerome, Commentary on Isaiah §4 (on Isa. 11:2); Gospel of the Nazareans in Jerome, Against the Pelagians 3.2; Funk 1985: 1.316; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.169, 177, 160.

11 Gospel of the Ebionites in Epiphanius, Panarion 30.13.7–8; Gospel of the Hebrews in Jerome, Commentary on Isaiah §4 (on Isa. 11:2); Gospel of the Nazareans in Jerome, Against the Pelagians 3.2; Funk 1985: 1.316; Schneemelcher 1991–92: 1.169, 177, 160.

18 Jeremias 1971a: 199–201 cites Jerome's Commentary on Matthew on Matt. 6:11 and Marcion. On ancient interpretation, see Fitzmyer 1985: 900, 904–5.

42 Accepted by Godet 1875: 1.284–85; rejected by Schürmann 1969: 302; Nolland 1989: 255; Ernst 1977: 202 (discussion but no clear choice). Rejecting the reading but attempting to explain its origin are Vogt 1959; Lohse, TDNT 7:23 n. 183; Marshall 1978: 230; Wiefel 1988: 122; Bovon 1989: 266–67 (following Metzger 1975: 139). See also Buchanan and Wolfe 1978; Isaac 1981; and Skeat 1988. The reading is noted in the fourth century by Jerome, Letter 52.8, who did not know what it meant.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against

Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

14 Jesus' tone differs from the "martyr" parallels in 2 Macc. 5–6 (where the intercession is a declaration of the sufferer's righteousness and faithfulness) and 7:14, 17, 19 (where the condemned promise God's vengeance on the executioner). On the other hand, some Jewish texts appeal to mercy for all, even sinners (Jon. 4:11; T. Ben. 4.2; Philo, Flaccus 2 §7; R. Brown 1994: 974), a merciful attitude that also appears in the church fathers (Ignatius, Ephesians 10.2–3; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.14).

7 See Bovon 1989: 310 for a slightly different breakdown and with additional comparisons to Didache 1.3–5 and Justin Martyr's Apology 1.15.9–10; 1.14.3; 1.16.1.

7 See Bovon 1989: 310 for a slightly different breakdown and with additional comparisons to Didache 1.3–5 and Justin Martyr's Apology 1.15.9–10; 1.14.3; 1.16.1.

7 See Bovon 1989: 310 for a slightly different breakdown and with additional comparisons to Didache 1.3–5 and Justin Martyr's Apology 1.15.9–10; 1.14.3; 1.16.1.

42 Marshall 1978: 70–71; Schweizer 1984: 29; Wiefel 1988: 53; Schulz, TDNT 7:400; Schweizer, TDNT 6:405; Justin Martyr, Apology 1.33.6.

14 The practice of multiple cups for the Lord's Supper is a later development. Justin Martyr's description in Apology 1.65–67, where the wine was prayed over in one cup and then distributed by deacons to those present and also taken to some not present, suggests multiple cups.

13 Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 8 (ca. A.D.. 150). The transfiguration is a counterargument to Trypho's objection.

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

19 Ellis 1974: 100; Plummer 1896: 134. Compare Tob. 8:1–3; Josephus, Antiquities 8.2.5 §§45–49 (where the reference is to the powers that Solomon—a regal figure—possessed over evil forces); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 85. Nolland 1989: 210 notes eight different methods that Jesus used in his various healings in Luke, all of which involve his word or personal touch.

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it "a cruel and disgusting penalty"); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

6 This is a supernatural revelation, but it is not a glance into heaven or into the future. Neither does the opening up of the heaven serve to bring comfort in the midst of persecution. Rather the Spirit is revealing himself to some on earth. For this reason the use of "vision" for Luke is less precise. For some texts from the second-century church fathers that briefly mention the event, see Ignatius, Ephesians 18.2 and Smyrneans 1.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 88.2–8; 51.2; 103.6; and Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.9.3; 3.17.1. See also Bertrand 1973 and Bovon 1989: 183–84.

10 The word group is rare in the NT: λυτρόω (to redeem; Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 1:18), λύτρον (ransom; Matt. 20:28 = Mark 10:45), λύτρωσις (redemption; Luke 1:68; 2:38; Heb. 9:12), and λυτρωτής (redeemer; Acts 7:35); cf. BAGD 482–83; BAA 979–80; Deut. 13:5 [13:6 LXX]; 2 Sam. 7:23; Hos. 13:14; Barn. 14.5–7; 19.2; Ignatius, Philadelphians 11.1; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 131.3; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.21.4.

15 Luce 1933: 174 is close to this and in addition regards such details as "legendary." He suggests a cure by "auto-suggestion," a rationalistic description that rejects the account's portrait. On the Jewish tradition of healings by touch, see SB 1:520; Schürmann 1969: 491 n. 139. On such an attitude reflecting popular belief, see Nolland 1989: 417. Nolland 1986 shows that the idea of "grace" as reflecting divine power is not a late Hellenistic concept; he cites Homer, Odyssey 6.235–36; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.1; Protevangelium of James 7.3, as well as the OT: Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:30; and Ps. 84:11 [84:12 MT]. He notes with particular care Ps. 45:2 [45:3 MT]; Sir. 12:16; Bar. 2.14; and T. Judah 2.1.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen's seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

10 Josephus calls crucifixion the worst of deaths; Jewish War 7.6.4 §203; see also Antiquities 2.5.4 §77; 11.6.11 §§261, 266–67; 13.14.2 §380; 17.10.10 §295; Jewish War 1.4.5–6 §§93–98; 5.11.1 §§449–51. For ancient non-Jewish sources, see J. Schneider, TDNT 7:573 n. 15. Among the key texts are Herodotus 1.128; 3.132, 159 (who ties the punishment to the Medes and the Persians); Tacitus, History 2.72; Cicero, Against Verres 2.5.63–66 §§163–70 (who calls it “a cruel and disgusting penalty”); The Digest of Justinian 48.19.28 (who sees it as the harshest punishment); Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 91.2 and Apology 1.13; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 2.24.4; and Origen, Against Celsus 6.10; Seneca, To Marcia on Consolation 20.3; R. Brown 1994: 948.

28 Both BAGD 429 and BAA 872 define κέραμος in Luke 5:19 as “roof tile” (see their bibliographies for details); LSJ 940. Nonetheless, the meaning “clay” is possible, as in 2 Sam. 17:28 and Shepherd of Hermas, Vision 4.1.6 §22.

3 Hendriksen 1978: 198 n. 166. In relation to the accuracy of Tertullian, who in Against Marcion 1.15 argued that Jesus appeared in the twelfth year of Tiberius (ca. A.D.. 26–27), Eusebius in Chronicon 2 notes that Jesus suffered in the nineteenth year of Tiberius (A.D.. 33), so that the church fathers do not agree on the dates of Jesus’ ministry either, since Jesus did not minister for seven years. Jesus’ appearing is probably a reference to his baptism by John.

12 So Leaney 1958: 230; Fitzmyer 1985: 1161–62; Mattill 1979: 201; Roberts 1948; Rüstow 1960; Cadbury 1950; Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.35.12. Beasley-Murray 1986: 102–3 takes this view, though he fails to evaluate this option when it is taken with a present force. Riesenfeld 1949 does not mention the evidence from Aquila noted in n. 13 below—a grave omission—in arguing that “in your midst” is not possible. Schlosser 1980:

1.202–4 argues that “in one’s power” is a possible first-century meaning, but he opts for “in the midst of.” His discussion is the latest careful examination of the evidence.

12 Tertullian, On Modesty 11, identifies the woman in Luke 7:36–50 with the one in Matt. 26:6–13. Gregory the Great identifies the sinful woman with Mary Magdalene (Zahn 1920: 330–32 n. 33 lists the ancient texts). Ephraem the Syrian (On the Sinful Woman; On Our Lord 47) equates Magdalene, Mary of Bethany, and the woman of Luke 7—taking the error one step further.

9 Three Old Latin manuscripts (a, b, and l*) attest to Elizabeth, as does the Latin version of Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.7.1. Jerome refers to this view as contained in Origen’s seventh homily on Luke. About A.D.. 400 Niceta of Remesiana (in the area of the former Yugoslavia) knows of this reading (De Psalmodiae Bono 76 or 9.11). Wiefel 1988: 56 and Fitzmyer 1981: 365–66 note the texts. Farris 1985: 108–13 has a detailed look at the issue, as does Bemile 1986: 5–19. Bemile correctly notes that the testimony of the fathers is for Mary (pp. 12 and 266–68 nn. 54–61), including Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.2; Tertullian, On the Soul 26; and Athanasius, In Lucam (PG 3:26:1393).

45 Plummer 1896: 279 notes two later traditions about John’s being preserved from boiling oil and his failing to succumb to hemlock, but the origin of these accounts is uncertain. Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 36, records the first incident.

20 Theodoret, On the Incarnation of the Lord 24; see PG 75:1461CD. R. Brown 1977: 477 cites J. Dö;derlein as a modern exponent.

10 Ezek. 1:1; Isa. 24:18; 64:1 [63:19 MT]; Gen. 7:11; Mal. 3:10; 3 Macc. 6:18; T. Levi 2.6–8; esp. 18.6–7 (a Christian interpolation?); Apocryphon of John 47.30; Maurer, TDNT 7:962; Schweizer 1984: 78; Bovon 1989: 180 n. 66; Godet 1875: 1.186–87 (who also treats the Synoptics' relationship to the account in John's Gospel).

3 For the presence of these verses in Q are Schneider 1977a: 324–25 and Wiefel 1988: 282. Fitzmyer 1985: 1073 sees 15:4–6 in Q and 15:8–9 in L. Other parallels are found in the Gospel of Thomas 107 and the Gnostic Gospel of Truth 31.35–32.9.

51 Fitzmyer 1985: 865–68, though going a different way, recognizes that it is unlikely that the text was a unit in a source shared with Matthew because, had Luke possessed Matthew's version, he would have used it. Fitzmyer is against the position of E. Norden, who argues that the original form is in Q and is reflected in Matthew. Norden cites not only Sir. 51 but also the Hermetic text Poimandres 32. Fitzmyer notes problems of artificial addition in Norden's citation of the Hermetic text.

This file was downloaded from Z-Library project

Your gateway to knowledge and culture. Accessible for everyone.

z-library.se singlelogin.re go-to-zlibrary.se single-login.ru

Official Telegram channel

Z-Access

https://wikipedia.org/wiki/Z-Library